Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is not a question as to whether it is just as good; it is a question of whether he has complied with the law.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it is just as good; and I would not want to be put into jail for it if I were the Secretary of the Treasury, and I would not want the gentleman to criticize me for it, either. Let me tell the gentleman one thing: We are in the war, as I stated yesterday, to win or we are going to lose—one of the two—and the more money we loan to England and France and their allies to properly equip their men and send them to the field to do the fighting necessary to win this war the less men we shall send from the United States, and I would rather give all the money in the United States Treasury or all of the money in the world than to see your boy go over there and die upon the battle fields of France. Of what value is money when measured that way?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We have paid $1,000,000 to Serbia and have a promissory note of an agent of that country. We have not an obligation of the Government which corresponds with the mandates of the law.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think we have; and the gentleman and I differ.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Michigan will permit, what is the difference between a promise to pay and a bond or obligation of the Government? The act does not say bonds and it does not say promissory notes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It says they shall be obligations of like character and under the same terms and conditions as bonds of the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. The act says, "bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions" as the obligations of the United States. These so-called promissory notes to which the gentleman refers are obligations bearing the same rate of interest and convertible into bonds under this act, and the act also contains a provision that if the United States Government issues bonds hereafter at a higher rate of interest than the foreign obligations shall likewise be converted. Every essential condition is already in these so-called promissory notes. At page 11 of the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury before the Ways and Means Committee you will find the following statements with reference to these obligations:

Mr. MOORE. Would you care to suggest the method by which the United States is protected by the actual control of these obligations?

Secretary McADOO. We take the obligations of those Governments in due form in each instance. They are the obligations of the Government concerned to pay back to us the amount of money advanced to it.

Mr. MOORE. They are preparatory to the delivery of their bonds? Secretary McADOO. They are short-time or demand obligations, which will be converted into bonds.

Mr. MOORE. And they remain in the Treasury Department here at Washington?

Secretary McADOO. Yes, sir. Mr. MOORE. It is not done through the Federal reserve banks?

Secretary McADOO. No, sir. In other words, for every dollar of loans that we have made to those Governments we have in the Treasury of the United States their obligations, duly executed by their representatives. In the case of each Government, the Secretary of the Treasury first receives assurances from our own State Department as to the authority of the foreign representative to execute the obligations on behalf of his Government.

Mr. MOORE. It is really a condition precedent to the final delivery. Secretary McADOO. While it is a demand loan at the moment, it will be converted into a long-time bond in due course.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say there is as much security back of these demand notes now in the possession of our Government as there ever will be for long-time bonds given by the same Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the law authorize you to accept a demand note or bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman says "No"; I say "Yes." The money has been given, and we have this promissory note, and what are you going to do about it? [Laughter.] I think the Secretary of the Treasury has done what any honorable man would have done. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in connection with the issue of any series of bonds under the authority of section 1 of this act the Secretary of the Treasury may determine that the bonds of such series shall be convertible as provided in or pursuant to this section, and, in any such case, he may make appropriate provision to that end in the bonds of such series (hereinafter called convertible bonds). In any case of the issue of a series of convertible bonds, if a subsequent series of bonds (not including United States certificates of indebtedness, war savings certificates, and other obligations maturing not more than five years from the issue of such obligations, respectively), bearing interest at a higher rate shall, under the authority of this or any other act, be issued by the United States before the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government (the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States), then the holders of such convertible bonds shall have the privilege, at the option of the several holders, at any time within such period, after the public offering of bonds of such subsequent series, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall have prescribed, of converting their bonds, at par, into bonds bearing such higher rate of interest at such price not less than par as the Secretary of the Treasury shall have prescribed. The bonds to be issued upon such conversion shall be in such form or forms, and subject to such terms and conditions of redemption, conversion, and maturity of principal, and of interest, and otherwise, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe in or pursuant to the convertible bonds, and such bonds shall be issued from time to time if and when and to the extent that the privilege of conversion so conferred shall arise and shall be exercised.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, throughout this bill in various sections there are references to the conversion or the convertibility of the low-rate interest bonds into higher rate of interest bonds. Section 4 being entirely related to that subject, I move to strike it out, and I desire to give the reasons. This provision following the law of April 24 is that in the issuing of bonds for war purposes that those issued at a low rate of interest when it came time to issue another series of bonds and that series should bear a higher rate of interest, then automatically the bonds issued at the lower rate would become convertible into the later bonds issued at the higher rate. Now that was an entirely new proposition in American finance; it was an entirely new proposition in world finance. The first we heard about it was when it was sought to issue a set of bonds amounting to about $150,000,000 in the latter part of the last session of the last Congress. The reason given by the Secretary of the Treasury at that time and by those favoring the proposition was that it was the system which Great Britain and Canada had found absolutely necessary in order to float their bonds and finance their war. That was defeated by the Committee on Ways and Means and that defeat was concurred in by the House, it having been passed with the convertibility feature in the Senate. Now, as I stated, the reason given for it was that it was found necessary by Great Britain and Canada to adopt it. The facts were at that time and the history of the transaction now is that at that time Great Britain had itself rejected the conversion system. For the first period of the war this system was not adopted by Great Britain but it was later adopted by that country, and issues of bonds at a lower rate were made convertible into those bearing a higher rate of interest.

But whatever may have been their experience, the last issue of bonds by Great Britain—which were issued, I think, in February, 1917; in fact, a little before this first discussion came up—the bond-issuing authorities abandoned the conversion system and the last issue of bonds were not sold with the convertible feature therein. I am informed that Canada has done the same thing. I am not certain about that, but inquiring from those better informed than myself I am convinced of that fact.

Now, the importance of this will be readily understood, especially when Members of this House recall that but an hour or two ago an amendment was voted down which sought reasonably to limit the time for which any bond should run. I submitted it for 30 years when as a matter of fact under the bill they may be issued for 50 years or 100 years, but in any event the longer the limit possible left in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, the greater may be the loss.

Now, while I move to strike out this section, I in no wise would interfere with the convertible feature of the $2,000,000,000 of bonds that have been issued and sold, because the law of April 24 takes care of those bonds and they are convertible. Assuming that this bill should pass with section 4 stricken out, there would be still in force a provision of the act of April 24, which provides the two billion of bonds already sold to the American people could be converted at the option of the holders into these 4 per cent bonds.

Now, then, we will just see what the effect of that convertibility has been. Assuming that 30 years will be the period, and that is the lowest probably thought about, it makes a difference on those $2,000,000,000 of one-half per cent a year. For the 30 years which the bonds were to run it would make a difference of 15 per cent of the principal. Fifteen per cent of $2,000,000,000 is $300,000,000. That convertibility, which added perhaps nothing, or not very much, to induce the sales, has saddled upon the American people for the next 30 years on the first issue of bonds an additional tax burden of $300,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman in making that statement forget that the bonds which we propose to issue under the authority of this bill are to carry surtaxes and excess-profits taxes and war taxes, while the other bonds will not carry any taxes except the estate taxes?

Mr. SLOAN. I will say to the gentleman I did not forget that, and I am pleased to have him suggest it, in order that I may explain it. It is not within reason that this war will last more than a year or two years, or say, three. It is within reason to presume that when this war closes these surtaxes, excess-profits taxes, and war taxes will all be repealed, so that there will not be even one-tenth of the bond period within which the exception to which the gentleman refers to may obtain. Now, let us see what effect it would have on the $7,000,000,000. We are talking about issuing these bonds at 4 per cent instead of 3½ per cent. Why are we doing so? The Secretary could not give us any tangible reason, only his judgment, which was based on general observation. I suppose his judgment is good, but the only tangible proof before the American people is the sale of these 3½ per cent bonds. Where were they sold?

Just a few of them have been sold in the last few weeks in New York. And sold by whom to whom? Nobody knows here, at least. But they were depressed below the 100 per cent. Why? We have been expecting a new bond issue in this country. Bondholder A of this country could very easily sell a little block of bonds to B, and B sell a little block of bonds at 99½ per cent, and that being the only market established, the Secretary of the Treasury would be compelled to say, "I can not issue a new or other set of bonds at 3½ per cent. I must increase it to 4 per cent." Which is precisely what he proposes to do. More than that, every bondholder in the United States would be interested at this time. We are all patriotic, it is true, but we are all somewhat given to gain and desirous of increasing our stores wherever we can and would desire to obtain a higher rate of interest on our holdings. How could they get it? By allowing the quotations to go out to the country of under 100 per cent. And here and now before their bonds are issued to them or come into their hands, they can come up and say, and have a right to say, and all the purchasers of the bonds, and perhaps every man on this floor will, as he has a right to, go up and say, "I want new 4 per cent bonds."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. SLOAN. I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Speaking of that depreciation of 3½ per cent bonds on the New York Stock Exchange, was there anything in the financial condition of this Republic, anything in the outlook anywhere, which would account for that depreciation of those bonds of a country so financially strong as this, except deliberate bond manipulation for bond purposes?

Mr. SLOAN. I should not like to say that that was the only reason, but it is sufficient reason for me to urge that we do not allow the American people to become its victims. [Applause.]

Now, what effect would it have on the $7,000,000,000? If the $7,000,000,000 should be issued at 4 per cent and we include the $2,000,000,000 being converted, 10 months from now, at the end of the fiscal year for which we are providing in this bill—and it is not pretended we are providing for any later period—another bond issue will be necessary. The same power, the same conditions, the same manipulation, followed by the same necessary judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, would say that the new bonds probably would have to bear 4½ per cent before they would sell. What would be the effect? The new bonds would bear 4½ per cent, and under this the old bonds, $7,000,000,000 of them, would be entitled to bear 4½ per cent. What would that amount to? Assuming that they would be given a period of life of 30 years, it would amount to, for $7,000,000,000, one-half per cent per annum for 30 years on $7,000,000,000. That one-half per cent for 30 years on $7,000,000,000 of bonds would amount to an additional burden on the American people of $1,050,000,000 in interest.

Now, then, we adopted this system—new and strange—for the sole reason that we were profiting by the mistakes of Great Britain and Canada. When this bond issue was up that finally ripened in the act of April 24 there was a statement made that it was necessary for this to be done. The statement was made by several eminent financial authorities among the Members of this body. I then challenged the correctness of the statement that it was Great Britain's policy and Canada's policy. After a fine lifting of the superior eyebrows, it was indicated that I was almost in contempt of court and guilty of lèse majesté for questioning it. Just recently, in the Committee on Ways and Means, one of the eminent members of that committee, Judge HULL, who, perhaps, makes as close if not a closer investigation of these particular facts than any other Member of the House, called it to the attention of the committee, citing the authority upon which I based in part my remarks.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we follow Great Britain and Canada off in their error it would be perfectly safe for us to correct our course. It seems to me that, by starting out and saying that this Secretary of the Treasury or his successor shall have the right to issue bonds at 10, 20, 30, 50, or 100 years with this convertibility feature in it during the life of the probable bonds we will have to issue, we will be placing an unnecessary burden of from one to two billion dollars in interest charges upon the American people. I think we ought to strike out this section. It will not deprive those purchasers of the first $2,000,000,000 of bonds of the right of conversion which it secured them.

We do not repeal the act of April 24, 1917. We have made a contract, so far as the $2,000,000,000 of bonds are concerned. We ought to, and would be, compelled to live up to it. But, under the circumstances, now I think we should abandon the convertibility theory of these bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman's amendment will not prevail. I am confident, and I believe the business men of this House—I am not a business man myself, however—will agree with me and with the Secretary of the Treasury and many of the experts of the Treasury Department and others outside of the Treasury Department who assisted in the sale of the last bonds in the opinion that if we do not put the convertibility feature into the bonds we shall never be able to sell the $7,000,000,000, or even $3,000,000,000, of the bonds. The conversion theory is that the man who now comes forward willingly and readily at the first demand of the Government and puts his money into these bonds, to help the Government out, ought to get the same rate of interest that is paid by the Government to the financial slacker who will hold back until the Government in its distress is forced to issue bonds bearing a higher rate of interest and then buys at such higher rate. Now, the proposition in the bill is to give the man who puts his money in at first at the lower rate the right to convert his bond into a bond bearing as high a rate as the bond issued to the man who comes in last. The gentleman's amendment denies him that right.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not a fact that Great Britain in its last issue of $5,000,000,000 bonds successfully sold that issue without the convertibility feature in it?

Mr. KITCHIN. But she raised the rate of interest to 5½ or 5 per cent. We could sell these bonds at 5½ or 5 per cent easily without the convertibility feature. But the Government should not give such a high rate. We can not sell this 4 per cent bond, subject to the estate and inheritance tax and subject to the supertaxes and excess-profits or war-profits taxes without this conversion privilege.

I believe it is right to pay me the higher rate if I now put my money into bonds at 4 per cent in order to help the Government out in its war struggle if the Government hereafter issues bonds at 5 per cent to Tom, Dick, and Harry, who are unwilling now to put up their money to help it but hold back waiting for the Government to be forced to issue bonds at 5 per cent. It seems only just that I should have my 4 per cent bond converted into the 5 per cent bond which the financial slackers get. If we do not put this conversion privilege into the act, thousands who are able to take these bonds would hold back in the hope that the Government would get into more stringent financial circumstances and would be forced to pay a higher rate of interest on bonds hereafter issued. With the conversion privilege in it, everyone would know that whatever may be the rate in the bond purchased he would have the right of converting it into a bond of the higher rate if the Government should thereafter issue bonds of a higher rate, and there would be no incentive to hold back.

I realize that there is much force in the argument of the gentleman and much reason to sustain his position, but he is basing his argument and his position upon the theory that the Secretary of the Treasury has the right hereafter to make the rate of interest higher than that carried in this bill. The Secretary is given no such authority.

There can be no rate higher than 4 per cent, the rate carried in this bill, unless Congress hereafter, when it authorizes other issues of bonds, shall authorize a higher rate. The right and opportunity will be given then to defeat any effort to make a higher rate. It is not in the discretion or power of the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the President, or anyone to allow on any bond authorized in this bill a higher rate than 4 per cent. It is in the discretion only of Congress; and before any of these bonds can be converted into bonds bearing a higher rate than 4 per cent, as carried by this bill, Congress must pass an act making the rate higher than 4 per cent. I myself can not conceive how this great Government, with its untold billions of wealth and resources, can ever be compelled to pay a higher rate than 4 per cent. I can not conceive how a patriotic people like the American people will ever force its Government to sell its bonds at a higher rate than 4 per cent; and I believe that if this war lasts two years or three years or five years or more it will never be necessary for the United States to issue bonds at a rate higher than 4 per cent. Why? The millions of people of small, modest incomes, not large enough to pay supertaxes, will consider 4 per cent, free of all State, county, and municipal taxes, and free of all other taxes except estate taxes, and supertaxes and excess profits, which they will not have to pay because their incomes are not large enough, a splendid investment. They will get a larger net return for such investment than they do in loaning out their money on other security, but subject to all taxes of all kinds—Federal, State, county, and city. Take my State, for instance, where the 6 per cent interest rate prevails. A person living in any city or town in my State who loans out his money at 6 per cent only gets a net return of 3½ or 3¼ per cent. He can put his money in a Government bond, now or hereafter at 4 per cent, and receive larger net return than he can by loaning it out at 6 per cent.

They say the wealthy man will not take these 4 per cent bonds if they be made subject to the estate tax, supertax, or excess-profits tax. If I were Secretary of the Treasury, I would know how to make him take his share of bonds.

I would go to the big, rich man who refuses to put his money into 4 per cent bonds when the Government needs the money to defend its life in this war, and I would say to him, "We can raise the money to finance this war, to continue this struggle to ultimate triumph, in only two ways, one by taxation and the other by the issuance of bonds. If you invest your money in these bonds, we will give you an opportunity to get back all you put in with interest at 4 per cent; but if you refuse to help your Government out in this way and force it to raise the money by taxation, we will see to it that it forces you to pay these taxes out of your incomes and profits, and you will get nothing in return." [Applause.] If we take that position, no bond will ever be issued at more than 4 per cent, and the rates which the gentleman anticipates will never be authorized. I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury or Congress will ever be forced to that position, because I am confident that there are patriotic men among the wealthy who will readily respond to the needs of the Government.

But remember, if the rate on the bonds issued under this bill is made more than 4 per cent, Congress will have to do it. If such an attempt shall ever be made here, we and you will have an opportunity to oppose it then. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SLOAN) there were—ayes 11 and noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in addition to the bonds authorized by section 1 of this act and the certificates of indebtedness authorized by section 5 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, for the purposes of this act and to meet public expenditures authorized by law, such sum or sums as in his judgment may be necessary, and to issue therefor, at such price or prices and upon such terms and conditions as he may determine, war-savings certificates of the United States on which interest to maturity may be discounted in advance at such rate or rates and computed in such manner as he may prescribe. Such war-savings certificates shall be in such form or forms and subject to such terms and conditions, and may have such provisions for payment thereof before maturity, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Each war-saving certificate so issued shall be payable at such time, not exceeding five years from the date of its issue, and may be redeemable before maturity, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The sum of such war-savings certificates outstanding shall not at any one time exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000,000. The amount of war-savings certificates sold to any one person at any one time shall not exceed $100, and it shall not be lawful for any one person at any one time to hold war-savings certificates to an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000. The Secretary of the Treasury may, under such regulations and upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, issue, or cause to be issued, stamps to evidence payments for or on account of such certificates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he will permit me to discuss this paragraph to-morrow. There is some information which I expect to have that I have not now. I may not want to discuss it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5901, for an additional issue of bonds, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TILSON, for two weeks, on account of official business.

To Mr. SEARS, indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his mother.

MONMOUTH COURTHOUSE BATTLE FIELD.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a speech made by the Speaker of this House at the Monmouth Courthouse battle field last Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by printing a speech delivered by the Speaker at the Monmouth Courthouse battle field last Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of House concurrent resolution 16 from the Committee on Insular Affairs to the Committee on Public Lands. It provides for the opening of certain lands in the Territory of Hawaii to homestead entry.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, to what lands does it refer?

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. To public lands in the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, is not this the bill upon which hearings have been held in the Committee on Territories?

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. I am not aware of that fact.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on the Territories taken any action on it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It has heard testimony on the bill in regard to amending the homestead laws of Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. If that is true, it is too late. The gentleman had better investigate the matter and let it lie over.

SOLDIERS' INSURANCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplementary report (No. 130, pt. 3) on House bill 5723, the soldiers' insurance bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to file a supplementary report on the soldiers' life insurance bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. At the same time ought there not to be extra copies of the report and minority views printed? They seem to have run out. They are very much in demand.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that they have the right in the document room to print an additional number of copies.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They have printed one additional lot and they have been exhausted.

Mr. STAFFORD. After the exhaustion of one lot they have the right to reprint another.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 6, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting part 2 of the report of the Commissioner of Lighthouses and recommending that it be referred without printing, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 133) providing for an investigation of the Ordnance Department of the War Department, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 133), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KAHN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5271) authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 134), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CURRY of California: A bill (H. R. 5933) to divide the northern district of the State of California into two judicial districts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 5934), to permit members of the National Soldiers' Home to purchase food supplies from the commissary department of such home for wives and other members of their families dependent on them for support at prices not to exceed 10 per cent above actual cost of such food supplies; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 5935) to prevent the teaching or advocacy of crime, sabotage, violence, or other unlawful methods of terrorism under certain conditions, and providing penalty therefor; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KAHN: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 20) authorizing the printing and binding of 50,000 copies of the tariff and revenue laws, including the tariff act of 1913 and all such laws passed during the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Memorial of the General Assembly of the State of New York, requesting that preference be given to the manufacture of such iron and steel as enter into the manufacture of farm implements; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the General Assembly of the State of New York, requesting the Federal Government to mobilize unemployed exempt conscripts and aliens and transport them to such States and Territories as need their services on the farms; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SIEGEL: Memorial of the General Assembly of the State of New York, requesting the Federal Government to make rules governing the manufacture and distribution of iron, steel, and other materials so as to give preference to the manufacture of farming implements; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the General Assembly of the State of New York, favoring the mobilization of immigrant aliens and the transportation of them to States and Territories where farm service may be needed; to the Committee on Agriculture.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALEXANDER: A bill (H. R. 5936) granting an increase of pension to James D. Reed; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 5937) granting an increase of pension to William E. Openshaw; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5938) granting a pension to Mary Elizabeth Graham; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COADY: A bill (H. R. 5939) granting an increase of pension to Agnes C. Cissel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

My Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 5940) granting a pension to Matilda J. Haines; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAMLIN: A bill (H. R. 5941) granting a pension to Benjamin Brown; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. IGOE: A bill (H. R. 5942) granting a pension to Nellie Collier; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5943) granting a pension to Catherine B. McDonnell; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5944) restoring to the pension roll the name of Catherine B. Casey, now Catherine B. McDonnell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROBBINS: A bill (H. R. 5945) granting a pension to George W. Beck; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHOUSE: A bill (H. R. 5946) granting an increase of pension to David Compton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of the Tunnel and Subway Constructors' International Union of North America, headquarters New York, urging legislation to insure to the people a reasonable supply of food at fair prices; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BACON: Petition of Ottman Eberbach, of Ann Arbor, Mich., against certain inconsistencies in the proposed tax on proprietary medicines in the revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Van Blerck Motor Co., Monroe, Mich., against that part of the proposed excess-profits tax in the revenue bill that would put them out of business; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BROWNING: Memorial of New Jersey State Federation of Labor, opposing a constitutional amendment for the submission to the States of the question of prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of the twenty-fifth annual convention of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor at Ashland, Wis., relative to the coal situation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the Wisconsin Life Insurance Co., Madison, Wis., protesting against article 4 of House bill 5723; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Petition of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor, at its thirty-fifth annual meeting, held at Ashland, urging that the Government assume ownership and control of all the coal mines in the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of the Motor Vehicle Publishing Co., protesting against any increase in second-class postage rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ESCH: Memorial of Wisconsin State Federation of Labor, favoring Government ownership of all coal mines; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FESS: Petition of Ohio Religious Liberty Association, against the passage of House bill 128; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McKEOWN: Papers to accompany House bill 5899, for the relief of Sophia Moran; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOON: Papers to accompany House bill 3043, to remove the charge of desertion from the name of John W. Bates; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of the board of directors of the Los Angeles (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce in regard to the labor situation; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of the board of directors of the Venice (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce in regard to using ships on their return trip from Europe to transport military prisoners to America; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ROBBINS: Memorials of sundry societies of Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Pennsylvania, asking enforcement of the new immigration law; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. WELTY: Petition of residents of St. Marys, Ohio, urging the passage of the Moore purple cross bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 6, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Boston, Somerville, Stoneham, Lynn, Dedham, Fall River, Everett, Wellesley, Quincy, Revere, Cambridge, Medford, Wakefield, and Ayer, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation subjecting friendly aliens to the provisions of the draft law, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 2843) granting a pension to Mary Maloney (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2844) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Mathewson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) providing a special canceling die to be used in advertising the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4289) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Simmons
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Ga.
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith Mich.
Dillingham	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Fernald	Kenyon	Page	Stone
Fletcher	Knox	Penrose	Sutherland
Gronna	Lodge	Poinsett	Tamm
Hale	McCumber	Ransdell	Varian
Harding	McNary	Saulsbury	Williams
Husting	Martin	Shafer	Wolcott
James	Myers	Sheppard

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are necessarily absent on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GORF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of illness in his family. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is unavoidably absent owing to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BRADY, Mr. WARREN, Mr. COLT, and Mr. THOMPSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. STONE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. REED], who is detained by important business.

I think possibly he will return to-day. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, Senators will recall the fact that when we were several days ago, probably more than a week ago, considering the first title of the bill, income taxes, the Senate adopted what are known as the Lenroot amendments in the House bill. It also at the same time adopted what is known as the Gerry amendment, which dealt with the last three brackets in section 2 of the income-tax title. The Lenroot amendments are in fractions. Beginning on page 3, line 7, the first Lenroot amendment was 13.75 per cent. Each of the brackets was raised in the same way, nearly all carrying a fraction, up to the point where the Gerry amendment would take effect. The Gerry amendment began on page 4, line 5, and provided for a rate of 35 per cent. It will be observed that the Lenroot amendment, in the bracket immediately preceding the Gerry amendment, raised it to 37.5 per cent, thereby making the Gerry amendment, which was adopted before we adopted the Lenroot amendment, less on the next higher bracket than upon the last bracket of the Lenroot amendment.

Mr. President, I desire to ask for a reconsideration of the action of the Senate in adopting both the Lenroot amendment and the Gerry amendment for the purpose of adjusting them. The committee amendment offered now proposes to adjust them in this way: We propose, in place of the Lenroot amendment, to strike out the fractions from the rates of that amendment and raise such rates to the next number; that is, where the rate is 13.75 per cent, to strike out this fractional rate and make it 14 per cent, and next, where it is 17.5 per cent, we propose to strike that out and make it 18 per cent. The next rate is 21.25 per cent. We propose to strike that out and to make it 22 per cent. The next is 25 per cent. We leave that as it is. That is a round number. The next is 30 per cent. We leave that as it is. The next is 33.75. We raise that to 34. The next is 37.5. We reduce that to 37. We do that in order to conform the Lenroot bracket with the next bracket, which is in the Gerry amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator dropped his voice at an important part. How much did he say he made the last bracket?

Mr. SIMMONS. The last bracket was 37.5, and we made that even 37 per cent, that being the first time where we reduced the Lenroot rates. We raised them in every other instance.

Mr. SMOOT. That equalizes the steps.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are doing that to equalize the steps. The next step starts with the Gerry substitute for 41.25 per cent in the Lenroot amendment. In the next bracket it is 35. We propose to change that 35 to 40, thereby increasing it 5 per cent over the Gerry amendment. The next brackets we propose to allow to remain as they were in the Gerry amendment as adopted.

Now, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the amendment on page 3, line 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment he has indicated was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. In line 7, page 3, I move to insert "14" for "13.75."

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator from North Carolina has the data, will he explain to the Senate just the amount we increase the revenue in that way?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not able to tell the Senator how much it will be increased. I do not think the increase will be very great. This is not done for the purpose of making increases so much as for the purpose of adjusting these rates. There will be an increase, but I have just made these figures this morning. I move to strike out "13.75" and insert "14."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 3, line 10, was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move, in line 10, page 3, to strike out "17.5" and insert "18."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. In line 13, page 3, I move to strike out "21.25" and insert "22."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered and the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. In line 22, page 3, I move to strike out "33.75" and insert "34."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered and the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On line 1, page 4, I move to strike out "37.5" and insert "37."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered and the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On line 4, in place of the first bracket in the Gerry amendment, which, I think, was "35," I move to insert "40."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator's first motion cover a reconsideration of the Gerry amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it did. I move to reconsider the vote by which the so-called Gerry amendment was adopted. The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move to strike out, on line 4, "41.25" and insert "40."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just one minute, if the Senator will pardon me. I think that covers the amendment.

Mr. BRADY. What was the amount to be inserted on page 7?

Mr. STONE. I think the amendment had better be stated at the desk.

Mr. KIRBY. That is what I wanted to ask the Senator to do.

Mr. STONE. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina, when he is through, to have the Secretary state just what the amendments are.

Mr. SIMMONS. Where in the Gerry amendment the percentage is 35, I move to strike out "35" and to insert "40."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the vote by which it was adopted having been reconsidered, by striking out "35" and substituting "40." The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move the adoption of the Gerry amendment as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I should like now to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not necessary, Mr. President, for the Chair also to put the motion for the adoption of these various amendments which have been made to the Lenroot amendment, so called?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has already agreed to the changes proposed. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator to the fact that an amendment was proposed and adopted by the Senate to line 4, on page 4—the so-called Lenroot amendment—changing the percentage of 41.25 to 40. The Chair suggests that the vote by which that amendment was adopted should be reconsidered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was agreed to. The amendment was made inadvertently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the percentage of 41.25 was changed to 40 per cent will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and it is reconsidered.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask what was the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the Gerry amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment was simply to raise the 35 per cent rate to 40 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. STERLING. I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina to what amount will the 40 per cent apply under the Gerry amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. That percentage will apply where an income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the original Gerry amendment carried 35 per cent on amounts of income exceeding $500,000 and not exceeding $750,000; 45 per cent on amounts exceeding $750,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000; and 50 per cent on the excess over $1,000,000. It is now proposed to change the first rate so that the three Gerry rates will be 40, 45, and 50 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. What becomes of the last bracket in the print of the bill from which I read?—

Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. On incomes of over $1,000,000 the tax will be 50 per cent. The 45 per cent bracket will provide for a tax of "45 per cent if the amount exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000, and the tax will be 50 per cent where the income is over $1,000,000."

Mr. NELSON. Then that requires an amendment in the bill as reported.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand such an amendment has been made.

Mr. NELSON. Has it been made?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment has been adopted. It was the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to inquire how soon will the Senator from North Carolina be able to furnish the Senate with the table or the computation showing exactly what these changes amount to?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will ask the expert of the committee to make the calculation immediately. I think it can be done in a very short time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I supposed it could be made in a short time, so that the Senate could be placed in possession of the facts.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly, I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think very few Senators realize the full effect of their action yesterday upon this bill. I think if I should ask any Senator on this floor to attempt to make a guess of what the tax would be out of the pockets of a stockholder who would receive $10,000 from a corporation earning 100 per cent upon its investment not one of them could give any idea of about how much it would be.

I think also, Mr. President, that few Senators realize that by our action of yesterday we have compelled people who under the individual income-tax provision pay not one penny of taxes to in reality pay as high as 50 per cent. It can be easily demonstrated that many persons who would receive an income from a corporation, say, of $900, which would not be subject to even the normal tax, would, nevertheless, have to pay out of that earning, which otherwise would come to them, the sum of $450.

Few Senators realize that under the present method which we have now adopted of levying this tax one person receiving $10,000 from one corporation would pay a certain tax, and that another person receiving $10,000 from another corporation might pay twice as much in taxes, or pay a very small tax.

We have accomplished one thing that is certain: We have succeeded in raising a greater amount of revenue; but at whose expense? That is a matter to which few of us have given a great deal of consideration. As the greater proportion of all these taxes must be paid out of incomes that come from business, and as 80 per cent of the business of the country is conducted through corporations, Senators can begin to realize how much the individual must go down into his pocket or the equivalent of it in the diminution of the income he would receive from the great corporations.

I thought it worth while, Mr. President, to have the Treasury expert prepare me a table showing the amount of tax which would be paid by an individual deriving his income from a corporation earning 100 per cent on the capital invested on a basis of $100,000 capital, 30 per cent of which is owned by the individual. Of course, with no taxes imposed, that individual would receive from the corporation, if none of its earnings were reserved, $30,000. It is quite interesting to note what the effect of the bill as at present framed will be upon incomes ranging from, say, $5,000 to $30,000 and as there are so many whose incomes range between those figures upon whom the pinch of taxation will be excessively high the effect of the proposed law upon them.

Now, I ask the Secretary to read in detail the table which I send to the desk, in order that we may ascertain how each item is arrived at and where a person who otherwise would receive $30,000 will be left when he has paid the Government tax. I will simply mention now the sum total. Out of the $30,000 he would have left $11,890 after the Government tax has been paid. From that, of course, he would still have to pay his State and municipal taxes, and I have assumed that a person whose ordinary income would be about $30,000 would pay upon an average of about $1,200 in State and municipal taxes. At least that would probably be as little as he would pay. On that basis, after he has paid all taxes, he will have left out of his $30,000, $10,690. I will ask the Secretary to read the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Table showing amount of tax paid by an individual deriving his income from a corporation earning 100 per cent on capital invested, on a basis of $100,000 capital, 30 per cent of which is owned by the individual.

Capital invested	$100,000
Net income for taxable year	100,000
Excess profits (above 10 per cent)	90,000
Corporation excess-profits tax:
$1,500 at 12 per cent	180
1,000 at 16 per cent	160
2,500 at 20 per cent	500
2,500 at 25 per cent	625
2,500 at 30 per cent	750
5,000 at 35 per cent	1,750
5,000 at 40 per cent	2,000
5,000 at 45 per cent	2,250
5,000 at 50 per cent	2,500
60,000 at 60 per cent	36,000
90,000	46,715
Net income subject to corporation tax	53,285
Corporation tax at 6 per cent	3,197
Net income left for distribution	50,088
10 per cent of capital allowed for reserve	10,000
Balance for distribution	40,088
Share of said individual stockholder, 30 per cent	12,026
Income tax of stockholder (income is exempt from normal tax because all dividends received from corporation):
$2,500 at 1 per cent	$25
$2,500 at 2 per cent	50
$2,026 at 3 per cent	61
	136
Net income, after deducting all Federal taxes	11,890
Amount which said individual would have received after allowing reserve	27,000
Amount paid in taxes	$15,110
Estimated State and municipal taxes	1,200
Total tax paid by individual	16,310
$11,890 less State and municipal tax of $1,200	10,690

Mr. McCUMBER. So, Mr. President, it will be observed that out of the $30,000 earned from such a corporation after having paid his tax the individual will have for the support of his family about $10,000. He will have paid to the Government more than $15,000 in taxes and will have paid in municipal and State taxes, according to my estimate, about $1,200.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. If the individual investor or stockholder referred to by the Senator has $30,000 invested and from it at the end he receives something over $10,000 net, after paying out Federal, State, and municipal taxes, his net earnings would represent something over 33 per cent on the investment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes, Mr. President; the great hardship, of course, would be on those persons owning only a little stock who would not receive any great amount of income; but the figures given are enough, Mr. President, to indicate the pinch of this method of taxation and its inequalities, and it is upon that particular branch of the subject that I wish to address my remarks this morning.

I am opposed to any further raise in the rates of taxation on incomes; I am opposed to it, Mr. President, because of my fear of its influence upon the American people in affecting their war spirit and their purpose to carry this war to a successful end and because an increase beyond that already reported by the committee would be both excessive and unnecessary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator if I am right in interpreting the figures which he has just had read from the desk. He takes a case where the capital invested is $100,000, and the net income for the taxable year is $100,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I have stated, I took a case where there was an excess profit of $90,000, or where there was 100 per cent profit, and, of course, I had to base my figures on a 100 per cent profit.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But the excess profits above 10 per cent are $90,000; in other words, the Senator has taken a case where before the war there was an investment of $100,000 and that $100,000 earned $10,000, and now after the war the same $100,000 is earning $100,000, which is 900 per cent increase over the earnings before the war. He has taken the most extreme case possible under this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have taken a case in which the profits are 100 per cent upon the investment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But the Senator—

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment, Mr. President. I do not care about arguing that matter any further, because it is clear just what the result will be. The Senator has assumed that the corporation referred to, which is a supposititious corporation only, made 10 per cent before the war. It may have made 100 per cent or it may have made 200 per cent, but there is only 10 per cent deduction, no matter what the amount of profit was before the war. What I am trying to ascertain is what the result would be upon the income. You can take a case where a corporation made 50 per cent, and the tax would be less; you can take a case where they made 20 per cent, and the tax would be still less; but the instance given is sufficient to give an idea of the operation of this tax upon corporation profits, upon the individuals entitled to these earnings.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator's figures are so startling to some of us that it seemed to me that it ought to be made clear that this is a most extreme case which he has presented to the Senate—a case where only $10,000 was earned before the war and after the war $100,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is nowhere near so extreme as many of the cases here, because we have been discussing cases where the profits were 300 per cent, 500 per cent, and 600 per cent upon the capital, and we have fixed our rates accordingly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But this is a thousand per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not take the highest rate, of course, which would be far more excessive; but among these excessive rates—and, of course, this is excessive—I took one of them which would be 100 per cent. That is one-fifth as much as the excessive rates for which we have provided.

Mr. President, I hate to see a bill the purpose of which is to carry this Government through the bewildering difficulties which naturally and inevitably beset a wholly unprepared nation when suddenly thrown into a great world-wide conflict used as a vehicle to cripple or paralyze its efforts. When the Nation is athirst I hate to see the fountain from which alone that thirst can be slaked poisoned at the source.

Mr. President, it is due to those boys who have gone to the front in defense of national rights and honor that they shall have back of them at all times an enthusiastic war spirit and sentiment. That spirit and sentiment are just as essential to the successful termination of this war as are guns and ammunition. I want, therefore, a revenue bill that, while it supplies every war need of the country, will at the same time create and maintain a sentiment for aggressive warfare, a popularity to insure vigorous prosecution of the war, and a courage to meet its exactions.

I know human nature well enough, and I am sufficiently acquainted with the history of the world to understand that no matter how patriotic a people may be, you can impose on them such onerous burdens as will dampen their ardor and destroy their war spirit. I also know the extreme caution of business well enough to understand that it can be so intimidated as to threaten the stability and very life of a country which in times of war is so dependent upon it. I recall the late Senator Hoar, an acknowledged statesman, philosopher, and historian, making the declaration in this Chamber, that the principal factor in terminating the War of the Revolution and in securing the recognition of the independence of this country was the excessive rates of maritime insurance on British shipping. British sailors were brave; British soldiers were not slackers. But when insurance rates pinched British trade too hard, every British industry dependent upon foreign trade became an advocate of peace and finally forced its Government into a yielding attitude which culminated in surrender.

Now that we are in this war, Mr. President, I want to make it a success. I want this country to achieve a victory that will enable it to conclude a peace so fair, so just, and above all, so assuredly permanent, that allies and enemies alike will rise and call us blessed. I do not want to force the country to back out of this war, either through a lack of popular sentiment or by arraigning the business interests and sentiment of the country against it. I know there are a great many people of this land who want to force the country to quit this war, to back out of it, no matter how such action affects the country, or what questions it may leave unsolved. I do not say that all those who desire to tax this generation to the limit of desperation want to create a sentiment that will compel the Government to take a backward step, but I do say, Mr. President, that if I wanted to accomplish that end I should attempt to do just what they propose, not only in this bill but in relation to other legislation before the Congress.

If I had felt that we, as a Nation, ought to have submitted to the assumption of a belligerent in declaring that more than 2,000,000 square miles of the ocean, covering all of the important lanes and avenues of sea commerce, should be a death zone, and that any American ship, no matter what its destination might be, or the innocent character of its cargo, should be sunk without notice, and our citizens and seamen murdered as pirates without even the protection accorded prisoners of war by the laws of humanity; if I had felt that we should have submitted, without striking a blow in self-defense, to the blockade of our Atlantic ports as they were blockaded, by threats of the destruction of our ships and seamen from February 1 until April 6, 1917, when Congress declared that it would not submit to these threats; if I had felt that we should have humbled our pride, and brought the blush of shame to the cheek of every patriotic American citizen by an abject surrender to these demands, proving ourselves to be unworthy the respect of the world or of our people; and if, after the country had declared that the acts of this great belligerent were acts of war which we were compelled to recognize, I still desired to get the country out of that war, without any regard to what the results would be upon our own future welfare or the welfare of future generations; if I felt that this war should immediately cease without any agreement whatever that would assure the world against the recurrence of such a damnable crime against that unoffending portion of humanity, the common soldier and the common citizen, who were in no sense responsible for it but who have had to suffer and die by the millions because of the ambition of a military autocracy; if I felt that all this talk about making the world safe for democracy and for the small nations of the world to work out their own commercial and industrial destinies, free from the ever-impending danger of annihilation and enslavement by some greater power, was mere political slush and of no concern to ourselves—in a word, Mr. President, if I were against my own country in this present war I would do just what I think is being done in this Senate to create dissatisfaction among the people—to lessen their ardor for the conflict which is before them and to thereby cripple and hinder our war efforts.

If I purposed to thus force my country to abandon this war, I should reason and act about as follows: I should first recognize that as the pinch of hunger weakens the physical prowess and lessens the mental courage of the soldier, so the undue and aggravated pinch of taxation lessens the war spirit and weakens the war ardor of those who, through the thousands of channels of business, must furnish the necessary means to carry that war to a final end. I would therefore make the tax just as heavy as I could upon this generation. I would discourage business and tax to the limit of desperation. I would reason that as it is this generation and not the coming generation which must shed its blood and part with its treasure in maintaining the war, so the pain and the pressure should be brought to bear against this generation to dishearten it and induce it to back out of the conflict without accomplishing the objects for which we entered it.

This, Mr. President, would be my principal antiwar weapon. What would be my next?

It would be the weapon of prejudice. Recognizing that in a republic no war can be carried to a successful termination unless it has back of it the sympathy and sentiment of a united people, I would proceed to work upon the prejudices of the people by declaring that this war was not a people's war, but a war instigated by munition manufacturers, that they might fatten upon the blood of our young manhood; that this war was instigated by wealth and fought for its profits. If I thought more of accomplishing a purpose than I thought of truth, I would circulate this lie throughout the land. I would carefully refrain from saying what truth and good faith would demand of me, that in this war the son of the rich man and of the poor man, of the banker and of the carpenter, of the lawyer and of the laborer, of the merchant and the farmer, responded to the call for volunteers with equal alacrity and enthusiasm and to-day stand shoulder to shoulder, comrades in arms, comrades in sentiment, comrades in patriotic fellowship, guardians of the honor and the life of the Republic. The whole bent of my argument, not only in what I should say but in what I should adroitly fail to say, would be to create and intensify class prejudice.

Knowing the eagerness of the press to publish the startling and sensational rather than the actual and commonplace; knowing that in the race for publicity cold realities and plodding truths have little hope of success against sensational, startling, and inflaming headlines, I would take advantage of that avenue to command the attention and reach the ear of the public and to plant the seed of this prejudice—a prejudice which I could not fail to understand would tend to clog the wheels of the vehicle of war and bring it to a stop before it had reached the goal of a victorious destination.

Nor would I stop here in my efforts to discourage the American people in this contest. If I felt that the people did not fully recognize just what this war means to our future and to the world's future; if I felt there was any lack of support of the Government in its purposes in this war, I would know just how to use that lack of understanding, that lack of war enthusiasm to block our war purpose.

Every man who recalls his schoolboy days, the occasional disagreements with his comrades, the battles which often followed, will remember that when his antagonist stopped between blows to suggest a parley he knew he had him beaten; and if he himself suggested a respite for any purpose, he realized that thereafter his own blows were less vigorous, that he was unable to rally from the blighting effect of his own suggestion. And, Mr. President, you know that that is true of a nation engaged in war.

When men are fighting a battle the ultimate purpose of which they do not comprehend as they should, they will listen more readily to a suggestion of peace. I would therefore fully understand the psychological effect of such a suggestion; I would know that if I could induce them to pause in their contest they would lose much of their courage and determined purpose, and it would thereafter be far easier for me to prevent a return to the same determination and vigorous purpose. If several nations, with divers interests, were allied in the contest, I would fully understand that the cessation of hostilities for the purposes of considering an independent or selfish peace by one of the great powers, even for a day, would destroy their cohesion and assure victory to their enemies.

And so I would introduce in Congress peace resolutions, knowing that they would have this clogging influence, that they would create this tendency to yield or surrender.

No man who by resolution or otherwise suggests a peace at this time, when the enemy has never once indicated that he would surrender the position which he took and which caused the war with us, can fail to understand that such a suggestion weakens his own Government; that no matter what the motive the act in its effect does lend aid and comfort to the enemies of his country.

Why, Mr. President, do those who purpose to break down the scheme of taxation recommended by the committee labor so assiduously to keep the attention riveted on a few corporations which have made extreme profits out of European nations through the sale of war supplies, while they purposely hide what the effects of their own scheme of raising revenue would be on the small business concerns of the country or the people of moderate incomes? Because, Mr. President, it is so easy to work the prejudice racket through the use of the term "corporation." And so they segregate and personify the corporation, painting it as a monster, black, grim, and large, absorbing countless millions and never responding to the requirements of the Nation in its hour of peril.

What a false caricature! What a demagogic play! What is a corporation? Is it a real being, or is it a name only? Wherein does it differ from a partnership or any character of business society in which men unite their energies or their capital in a common undertaking? There is no difference, as we all know. But we also know that if we use the term "partnership" or "society" instead of "corporation" the word would lose its charm. It would be impossible to evoke the same degree of hostility.

Mr. President, a corporation is not a material thing. It is but the name under which human beings carry on the great industries of the country, a name which enables the society to sue or be sued in or under its adopted name. But, after all, it is but a society of men and for men. Of itself, it eats nothing; it wears nothing; it consumes nothing. It is not even conscious of its own existence. It is as senseless of its being or its use as the steel girders spanning the streams and valleys over which the commerce of the world is carried. It is but the mechanism, the instrumentality used by people in every line of human endeavor. Why, then, create or perpetuate the false assumption that dollars can be taken from the corporation? You know that every dollar you levy, every dollar you exact is a dollar that belongs in whole or in part to some person; that it is a dollar taken out of the pocket of some person. Whether it is taken in the first instance from the corporate mechanism before it is distributed, or in the second instance from the individual after it is distributed, in either case the dollar taken belongs to some person, some person possessed of the same emotion, the same hopes, and having the needs that we have.

Of course the Government can take that dollar wherever it finds it, at whatever point in the transmission from one man to another it finds it. The only question is which is the best way, which way will be the most just to the person it is actually taken from. One class of tax advocates in the Senate say, "Conscript everything a corporation earns above a certain per cent." Another class, who recognize the fact that whatever you take must come from the individual citizen, ask you to pause a moment and ascertain the injustice of this scheme of conscription against the individual citizen or the several classes of citizens from whom it is taken. The moment you pause to consider the consequences of the application of this rule you will see that a conscription of the earnings of a corporation operates as a conscription not of a part only but of practically all the income of thousands upon thousands of people whose principal incomes are derived from corporate stock. Let us exemplify this by taking even one of those great corporations so often alluded to in this debate. Let us take one whose estimated net earnings will be $20,000,000. Now, who in reality will own that $20,000,000? I called attention to this the other day. I shall exemplify it a little further. Probably 10 men will own one-half, or about $10,000,000 of it. The income of those 10 men will, therefore, be $1,000,000 each. The next five million will probably be owned by a thousand people. Their income, therefore, will be $5,000 each, or what you might call a moderate income. The other five million will probably be owned by 10,000 people. Their income would, therefore, average about $500 each, which would be a very meager income. Now, apply this conscription tax which you would apply to this corporation, and what would be the result? Your first 10 people could pay the tax and still have sufficient left to live on very extravagantly. Your next 1,000 would pay a percentage on their income that would be most exorbitant and extortionate, because in many instances it would amount to from 50 to 60 per cent. The next 5,000, the poorest people, those who ought not to be taxed one penny and who under the individual income tax provisions of the bill are not taxed one cent, would be robbed of practically all of their income.

And yet, Mr. President, those of the committee who have opposed such a method of taxation, easy on the few, inexorably harsh on many more, and actually confiscatory on the much larger number, have been pillorized by those whose weapon is always the weapon of prejudice.

What is the only true method of levying a tax on incomes? It is, first, that those whose income only assures a living under rigid economy shall pay no part of their income to the Government; second, that those of moderate income shall pay a moderate tax; and, third, that those earning an excessive income shall pay a very large tax. Your corporation conscription system reverses this just law, and your committee therefore based its principal tax on the individual income which could be easily varied by an ascending scale to operate equitably on each class of incomes, while levying only a nominal tax on the corporation as such and on such undistributed corporation earnings only as would assure reasonable taxes upon those undistributed profits which might otherwise escape taxation altogether.

Your committee, therefore, in adopting this scheme of taxation were actuated by a sense of equity. The only complaint that can, in my opinion, be urged against the tax on individual income presented by the bill is that it is too heavy on those of moderate incomes. It is too heavy on incomes ranging from $5,000 to $30,000. People who have been living on a scale commensurate with these incomes in the large cities, who have purchased and furnished homes that could be maintained on such incomes, will find it exceedingly difficult to pare their expenses down to the necessities of their earnings as they will remain after the Government has taken the heavy toll provided in the bill. They can not sell their homes and go into apartments or boarding houses, because there will be no demand for such homes. They must continue to pay the heavy taxes levied upon dwellings heretofore occupied by them. They must still pay the higher prices for coal to heat them, for water and electric current to supply and light them.

But as the vast proportion of the people who will pay the income tax are those whose earnings range from $5,000 to $30,000, this rate could not be greatly reduced without creating a deficit in the amount which the committee had determined to raise from this source, and so this too heavy burden was not, to my mind, sufficiently lightened. I think we are levying too heavy a tax on the people of the country for the first year. I think we should levy a smaller tax on these moderate incomes, leaving the heavy tax proposed on the very large incomes and raising the balance required by bond issues.

And so, Mr. President, the majority of the committee thought, but were influenced to bring in a higher levy that they might compose, if possible, their views with those which advocated an extremely high rate of taxation and with the views of those who want this generation to pay all the expenses of this war.

Now, Mr. President, the moment the committee, swerved by the clamor of the press for a higher excess-profits tax, abandoned the only logical rule of taxation—namely, a tax on the income of the individual, which could always be graduated to work approximate justice, and entered upon a scheme of levying an additional tax on corporations or on the business from which the income was derived, thereby imposing a double tax on the same income, and which, of course, could not be graduated equitably, because the amount held by the owner of stock representing a million dollars paid no greater rate than that portion represented by stock of $100—we naturally found ourselves confronted by enormous difficulties.

The press of the country and the people of the country demanded a heavy tax on war profits. They had not figured out any method or any basis for computing such war-profits tax, but they wanted to tax these war profits as distinguished from any other kind of profits. They wanted to do just what the opponents of this bill in all of the debates have insisted upon—that we should get at the enormous profits that had been made in the production of war munitions and other things demanded by this war. Every utterance of the opponents of this bill increased the clamor for a war-profits tax. The committee responded to that demand. There was no possible way to determine what particular businesses had made money because of the war and what businesses had made money irrespective of or despite the war. It was impossible to determine with any reasonable degree of accuracy the capital invested by each corporation or business as a basis for the levy.

But, Mr. President, while we could not tell what percentage of increase there had been in any business because of the war, we could by a very simple process determine how much more the several businesses of the country were earning after the war than they were earning before the war started. All we had to do was to subtract their prewar earnings in any year from their war earnings in any year. But as no two years' earnings prior to the war were exactly the same, we adopted the average of three years as the basis and subtracted that average from the earnings of the year upon which the tax was to be levied. No one could complain of the fairness or of the comparative accuracy of this method.

But, as suggested, the moment we attempted to apply a rule we found that some businesses were making great profits before the war and continued making those great profits after the war began; that institutions making 100 per cent before the war and which were only making 100 per cent after the war would pay no taxes because the war had not increased their earnings; while those which had made 10 per cent before the war and 100 per cent after the war would be paying a tax of 90 per cent of their earnings. Of course, that did not work equitably. It did not work equitably because the comparative earnings were not equitable, and it was impossible to levy a tax that would work with any degree of equality, based upon war profits alone. But the country demanded, the press demanded, and the opponents of this bill for the most part demanded such a tax, and the committee reported it.

The moment, however, the bill got before the Senate and those who had advocated so earnestly a tax on war profits began to investigate the subject, the moment they stopped preaching long enough to begin to practice upon any set of figures, they saw the inequalities of a war-profits tax and immediately began to berate the committee for doing just what they had vociferously declared the committee should do.

And so, to again meet their demands, to meet the very suggestions which they had made as soon as the bill was before the committee, that committee met and brought in an amendment to conform to what these opponents declared should be the rule of taxation of profits.

This rule, Mr. President, abandoned the war-profits idea entirely and substituted a tax on corporate incomes. But we are led by this insistence into an inequality and injustice just as glaring as that complained of when the committee reported a substitute for the title which levied a tax on war profits. We now proceed to, first, levy a tax on the money earned by the corporation or partnership, and which is owned by the individual stockholders or the copartners, and then we tax the same sum, the same earnings again to the individual who owns it. And, as I have shown before, we thereby compel the individual stockholder who, under the individual income-tax provision, would not be compelled to pay anything, to surrender a large percentage of his earnings to the Government. What we should have done is just what we have done in Title I, determine just what each individual should pay who receives a specified income, and graduating that tax as we have graduated it. We should then have levied a nominal tax on corporations or upon the business of the country which should not be at all excessive. There should be but one excessive tax on excessive profits. The excessive profits should be charged to the individual and the graduated tax levied upon it as an individual income, a moderate tax on the moderate income and a very large tax on the very great income.

It should be a small, flat tax; and then a further tax on undistributed incomes of corporations above what was necessary, and proper for them to withhold, to the end that all incomes, whether distributed or not, should pay a reasonable tax to the Government.

This levy, together with the levies under the other titles of the bill, should have been the limit of our taxation for this year. The balance of the money required should have been obtained through the issuance of bonds.

Mr. President, the avarice, the gross extortions of a few great American concerns in taking unconscionable advantage of the necessities of and bleeding the warring nations of Europe to the limit have created a feeling of antipathy against them that endangers not them alone but the great bulk of the American industries which have conducted their affairs in accordance with the principle of "live and let live." In order to get even with those who made immense profits in 1915 and 1916, there is a disposition to punish all the others who earned no greater profits because of the war and whose profits have been moderate.

Great Britain and France found themselves suddenly plunged into the vortex of a war for which they were wholly unprepared. They needed munitions and equipment far beyond the capacity of their own mills and factories to produce. Every other great manufacturing country in the world but one was engaged in that struggle and was equally unprepared. The United States alone could supply their demands. They were therefore compelled to pay whatever those concerns demanded, and, Mr. President, they demanded the last ounce of blood. They made enormous profits. If we can now reach these concerns, if we can extort by the strong arm of the taxgatherer a goodly portion of that which they extorted from foreign countries two and three years ago without injuring the thousands of innocent concerns, well and good; but if we are to do this by the application of a rule which might injure every other business, we should hesitate a moment to consider the consequences of our proposed action.

So pausing, what will we find? Will we find these profits, these funds, drawn from European belligerents now deposited and held as bank credits?

Will we find them anywhere in the vaults of the concerns themselves? Mr. President, we know we will not so find them. Why? Because these earned millions could not remain idle. They were scarcely earned when the very demand which created them required increased facilities and equipment to supply a greater and growing demand. For the most part, therefore, they went back into extensions and into increases in plant structure and equipment. They became capital. Profits earned one year became employed and invested capital for the succeeding years. We can not, therefore, reach the 1915 and 1916 profits of these concerns by any scheme of excessive tax levies without confiscating the capital now invested in the very lines which this Government in its extremity requires shall be operated to the very limits of their capacity. We need the products which that added capital will yield us next year a hundred times more than we need the dollars which it represents.

But, Mr. President, we did not get into this war until April, 1917. The laws which we enacted to protect the Government against excessive charges, and which will also protect our allies against excessive charges, will not be in full force and operation before the end of the year. So during this year there will probably be a greater profit earned by these concerns than before. All of these profits, above a reasonable return upon the investment, should be reached by taxation. But in determining a reasonable return upon investment we must make due allowance for the depreciation in value of those extensions and equipment which will become practically useless when the close of this war compels a return to a normal demand. We must either allow these concerns to make such a profit as will take care of all the money invested in extensions, or we must do just what the Government is now doing in many instances, advance out of the National Treasury every dollar required in extensions and machinery.

If, in order to supply the war demand, any great manufacturing plant must expend $50,000,000, and if the war were to close in two years, at the end of which time that $50,000,000 of investment would be worthless, then the company must not only make an interest on this $50,000,000 invested but also must make a profit equal to the $50,000,000 invested during that period in order to preserve its capital. There are those who insist that the Government should take all of the profits made this year, even though it would be compelled to advance the sum necessary to make the extensions required by the Government demands. But I am confident that the private enterprise can conduct its business far more economically than it would be possible for the Government to do it.

If those Senators who are as eager to bleed the business enterprises of this country to the limit as some of those enterprises have been to bleed the warring nations of Europe to the limit would just investigate the causes which compelled this Government to make certain contracts for supplies, they would begin to realize the dangerous tendency of their extreme proposals. A short time ago the administration, through the Secretary of the Treasury, made an estimate of about what war munitions the Government would need in the first year of this campaign. They presented this estimate to the munitions makers. The reply received was, "We can not produce the required quantity." "Why can not you produce the required quantity?" "Because we have not got the capacity." "Why not, then, enlarge your plants?" "We can not do that." "Why can not you do it?" "We have not got the money to do it." "Why can not you borrow the money?" "Because we have not got the credit." "Why have not you got the credit?" "Because we are threatened with such a heavy tax upon what we may make if we are successful, while we must suffer the entire loss of our capital if we are not successful, and in any event the capital invested in extensions would be practically worthless at the end of the war that the banks will not lend us the money on such an uncertainty." That was the answer which was given.

What then happened? The Government was compelled to enter into a contract with these manufacturers whereby the Government advances every dollar in the erection of additions to these plants, every dollar for the machinery that is to be used therein, and is to take the property back—that is, these additions and this machinery—at the close of the war, because, there being then no demand for the product, those extensions will be practically worthless.

Now, I think, as a whole, it would have been far better policy to have said to these manufacturers, "Take the money out of your earnings—at least a sufficient amount—to pay for these extensions and we will allow you a reasonable return upon the investment, such a return as will enable you to care for the necessary depreciation which the cessation of war will unquestionably produce and maintain a healthy business credit. The country, Mr. President, would be far ahead under such a scheme at the end of the war.

Mr. President, there is a wrong impression, a mistaken impression, an impression that has been created more by the debates in the Senate than by any other instrumentality, unless it be the press, that these great concerns which have made such exorbitant profits out of the fighting nations of Europe before we entered into this war, will continue to make the same profits out of this Government and out of our allies. Under recent legislation this is not possible. Before we engaged in this war we had no direct interest in the contracts that were made by private individuals to supply the war needs of foreign nations. We could not interfere with those contracts. All the people of the country shared in these big profits. They raised the price of labor. Labor purchased more freely in every market, and that required additional production and better prices; and so the whole country prospered. But when we ourselves entered this war and such exorbitant charges for war supplies affected not only ourselves, but those engaged in the common cause, we immediately passed legislation which would enable the administration to prevent any further excessive or unjust profits. I assume that the administration will perform its duty and that these laws will be enforced. If it does, there will be no excessive profits on which we can justify an excessive levy for the next fiscal year. Every business should be assured a reasonable profit, and in war times a reasonable profit means a higher than normal profit, because it must be a profit that will anticipate the reaction that is sure to follow.

Appropos of this argument, Mr. President, I wish to read into the Record here an excerpt from an editorial in the Washington Post of September 3, referring to some observations made by President Wilson in his letter to American manufacturers, in which he said:

It is just as much our duty to sustain the industrials of the country, all the industries that contribute to its life, as to sustain our forces in the field or high sea.

The editorial proceeds:

This is a hint that the Government, if given the power to fix prices, will fix the price of raw materials needed by industry in order to sustain industry and keep it active in war service. That is the proper thing to do; that is what must be done, in fact, if industry is to become as effective in supplying the forces as the forces themselves are expected to be in battle.

Therefore the Senate should not cut to the quick in taxing industry. No disabling tax should be imposed. Let extravagant war profits be eliminated by forcing prices down all along the line. It is not common sense to permit industry to collect huge profits from the public, after boosting prices out of reason, and then try to square the account by taking away the profits in taxes. It does not square the account. The public is still out of pocket. Prices are still excessively high. The consumer is the loser.

A moderate policy in taxation and a moderate policy in price fixing will accomplish what is sought. One will make industry bear its load of war expenses and the other will relieve the people without stopping the wheels of production. Let Congress boldly and confidently provide for price fixing of basic materials, all of them. The manufacturer will then be assured a square deal in acquiring raw materials and the price of the finished product will be forced down. Full publicity as to costs and profits will prevent extortion. Then there can be one price for all—Government, allies, and public.

So, Mr. President, it is my ardent hope, my patriotic desire, that this war measure will in its final form represent the calm yet determined purpose of the Government to wage the most energetic warfare, a measure that will maintain the business prosperity of the country, upon which alone we must rely to meet the demands of an ever-increasing expenditure. This is no time to gratify animosities, no time to seek instrumentalities of punishment, no time to make threats which will intimidate the innocent more than the guilty. My hope is that on its face this measure shall express no animosities, that in its folds there shall be found no dagger of destruction, in its words no threat of confiscation. Just, as just as an income-tax measure, dealing with irreconcilable inequalities can be made, it should be made, but hope and encouragement should be read in its every line.

Certain as I am that this war can not be fought to a successful termination short of several years, we had better a thousand times be too lenient than too severe or exacting. Back of the courage of the soldier must be the courage of the great business world, which in modern warfare is the soldier's only reliance. Our American armies must be fed and clothed and munitioned to the highest degree of efficiency. All that requires money, and all money comes from business profits. It must be made before the taxgatherer can lay his hand upon it.

It is last analysis what we back our armies with is the surplus energy of a people expressed through the thousands of prosperous industrial activities. That energy can be maintained only through the buoyancy of assurance and faith, and the whole should be backed by a patriotic conviction of the justice of our cause.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McCumber	Sheppard
Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Mich.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I inquire what amendment is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], to strike out section 2 and insert a substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the question of raising revenue for governmental purposes is always a troublesome one. From the beginning of civilization it has perplexed the minds of scientists and statesmen. Its proper solution is one of the difficult tasks of government. Taxation is always burdensome, and if it were in my power I would gladly relieve all our citizens from its exactions. Burdensome as it is, however, it is absolutely necessary. In time of war it becomes more necessary and more troublesome. Modern warfare has increased the burdens of taxation, and we are confronted to-day with a necessity for raising more money than was ever before demanded of any people on earth. The numerous expenditures necessary for carrying on the war stagger the human imagination. The tremendous amount that we must raise from our people is almost beyond the ability of the human mind to realize.

There are only two ways in which this money can be raised. It must be raised by the issuance of bonds or it must be raised by increased taxation. There is no doubt in my judgment but that both of these methods must be utilized by this Government in the present war. It is bad financial policy, however, to resort to the issuing of bonds at least until all reasonable limits of taxation have been exhausted. It is not a sound economic or financial policy to issue bonds for the purpose of carrying on war or, for that matter, for any other enterprise until we have raised all the money by taxation that can be raised without interfering with the living expenses and with the proper conduct of the business operations of all our citizens.

There are those who believe that practically all the necessary funds should be raised by the sale of bonds and that no perceptible increase of taxation should take place at the present. This method would saddle the entire expense upon future generations. In all the wars of the past a very large amount of the funds necessary have been raised by the sale of bonds. At the present time we have no people to sell bonds to, excepting our own people. We are almost the only Nation in the world that is not, partially at least, bankrupt. If we issue bonds, they must be sold to the same people who must pay the taxes if we raise the necessary funds by taxation. If we issue bonds, we dispose of them only to the people who volunteer to buy them. If we raise the expenses of the war by taxation, we conscript money from the same people and take it for governmental purposes. If, therefore, we apply the doctrine of conscription to the financing of the war, as we have to the raising of an army, it would follow that the men raised by conscription will be paid by conscription. If we sell bonds, it means not only that those who follow us must pay the face of the bonds, but they must pay interest on them, which will amount to much more than the face of the bonds. It follows, therefore, that whatever amount we raise by the sale of bonds must be paid at least twice, so that the raising of money by bonds will be in the end much more expensive and the burden much greater than if we raise the same money by taxation.

It is conceded by all, I believe, that we should not, in our plan of taxation, interfere any more than we absolutely must, with the transaction of all legitimate business. We ought also to avoid as long as we possibly can, taxation upon consumption. That kind of a tax will have a tendency to increase the already high cost of living. We ought to leave if we can, exempt from taxation, a living for all of our citizens. It is impossible to secure money where none exists. Any scheme of taxation must fail if it makes its levy where there is no money. There is no plan by which we can obtain money from people who do not possess it. From such a source we can not get money, either by the issuing of bonds or the levying of taxes, neither from volunteers nor by conscription.

It follows, I think, as a legitimate conclusion, that if you do not want to interfere with business, and if you do not want to create hardship and dissatisfaction among our people, you must take the taxes from such sources as will not tend to increase the cost of living or create a hardship upon those who have to pay them. It is not only the amount of taxes we levy on an income that we should consider, but it is exceedingly important likewise to take into consideration what the taxpayer will have left after he has paid his taxes. To avoid hardship, he should always have a sufficient amount of money left from his income to support himself and his family in a proper and comfortable way. Assuming that the tax levied in necessary, then an income tax levied according to this rule, would never bring suffering or hardship, and ought not be objected to by any patriotic citizen.

The pending amendment seeks to increase the tax on incomes. It does this by a sliding scale. It levies no tax upon any income of $5,000 or less. It is true that incomes of less than $5,000 are taxed under existing law, but the pending amendment levies no tax upon any income of less than $5,000. Upon that part of an income between $5,000 and $6,000 it levies a tax of only one-half of 1 per cent. It levies a tax on the next thousand—that is, on that part of an income from $6,000 to $7,000—of 1 per cent, and so it continues to increase one-half of 1 per cent upon each additional thousand dollars of income, until the income reaches $20,000. Then it increases three-quarters of 1 per cent upon each thousand dollars' additional income, until the income reaches $30,000, and then it increases 1 per cent for each $1,000 additional income, until the rate reaches 32 per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $46,000 and does not exceed $47,000. It continues to increase at different rates until it reaches a rate of 50 per cent upon the net income in excess of $1,000,000.

I can not see how this amendment, if enacted into law, would bring hardship to any living person. Take, for instance, the man with an income of $10,000 per year. If this amendment were adopted, such an income would have to pay a total tax under existing law and the amendment of $355. This would leave the holder of such an income a net income, free from all Federal taxes of every kind and description, of $9,645. Can it be said that such a tax is a burden to a man who is in possession of such an income?

Take, for instance, the man with an income of $15,000. His total tax under the existing law and this amendment, would be $755. This would leave him a balance of $14,245. His tax as a matter of fact would be just 5.03 per cent on his total income. It might be well to note that if this man lived in England and had the same income, he would have to pay an income tax of 30½ per cent, or $4,625.

Let us take an income of $30,000. The tax, if this amendment were enacted into law, not only of the increased tax provided for under this law but the tax under existing law also, would amount to $2,947.50. This would leave a man with an income of $30,000 per year a balance of $27,052.50. Would there be any danger of such a man suffering for the necessities and comforts or even the luxuries of life? Is it unpatriotic to ask him, out of an income of $30,000, to pay this comparatively small sum to help support his country and pay the expenses of the war that in many instances was instrumental in enabling him to make this enormous amount of money? The tax that he pays would amount, on his total income, to a rate of 9.38 per cent. If he lived in England he would have to pay 35½ per cent on the same income.

Let us now take the man who gets an income of $50,000. Under the proposed amendment the tax, together with the tax under existing law, would amount to $9,117.50. This would leave him a balance to care for himself and family and to keep the wolf from the door of $40,882.50. This same income in England under existing law would have to pay a tax of $21,250.

A man who has an income of $500,000 would have to pay a tax of $240,617.50, leaving him the paltry sum of $259,382.50 with which to pay for coal to keep himself and his family warm during the winter.

The man with an income of $1,000,000 would pay a tax of $530,617.50, leaving him, in round numbers, a balance to defray his household expenses for a year of $500,000. By following Hoover's advice, he would be able to squeeze through.

It must be remembered in every case that these balances are net. They are not subject under any Federal law to any kind of taxation. Can people who have these enormous incomes justly complain? Is there any injustice in levying these taxes upon those who are so fortunate as to enjoy under the laws of our country these enormous incomes? The man with an income of $10,000,000, if it were given to him in dollar bills, would not be able to count it, working eight hours a day every working day of the entire year. The truth is that many of the holders of these immense incomes, if they were compelled to count their incomes, would not have time enough left to spend them. The facts are that large as some of these amounts appear to be, they come from incomes where the holder of the income would never realize that the tax was levied and collected from him if publicity were not given to the law.

Under no possible luxurious system of living can anyone expend in a year, in any legitimate way, these huge balances. There are limits to the power even of money. The man who has an income of a million dollars can do everything and anything, so far as any legitimate expenses of himself or his family are concerned, that could be done if his income were doubled. It is an impossibility for the amounts to be legitimately expended for living expenses.

It must be remembered also that these taxes do not interfere with the capital. The capital is left undiminished, untouched, and uninjured. The business is left undisturbed. It must be remembered also that if we raise money by issuing bonds, a large number of these incomes will not be called upon to contribute anything. Many of the enormously large incomes have been brought about either partially or entirely, on account of war conditions. To a great extent they will disappear when the war is ended, and if we do not tax them now they will escape taxation forever. If the war has given a man an income of a million dollars where he would otherwise have had an income of only $100,000, can it be said that there is any injustice even if we took all of the surplus for the payment of the very war that made his income possible?

And yet there is bitter opposition to this amendment on the part of those who favor the committee bill. Instead of sufficiently taxing war profits and swollen incomes it is proposed to tax coffee, tea, cocoa, sugar, molasses, and medicines—to levy a tax on every parcel-post package, on every freight receipt, on every express receipt, on every ticket on the railroad; and as the bill was originally brought in by the committee it levied a tax on every letter sent through the United States mails. These taxes are small, it is true. They are levied in pennies, but the burden, small though it is, is sustained by countless thousands who are already bowed down in poverty, already struggling in every possible way to feed and clothe themselves and their families. It is a less hardship for the holder of a $2,000,000 income to pay $1,000,000 of it in taxes than it is for the poor widow, struggling to feed and clothe her children, to buy a pound of sugar or a pound of coffee.

The only objection I have to the proposed amendment is that on the large incomes it does not take enough. It may be necessary before the war is over to levy a consumption tax, and to tax every letter that is sent through the mails. It may be necessary to tax every express receipt, every freight receipt, every railroad ticket, every ounce of medicine, and all the other necessities of life. It may become necessary to tax the medicine of the sick, the blind, the crippled, and the insane who have been returned to our shores from the blood-drenched trenches of Europe, but that time will never come with my consent until the last swollen dollar of war profits and excessive incomes has been conscripted, the same as we have conscripted the human flesh and blood of American citizens.

The cost of living has already increased to such an extent that many of our people, many of our families, who have heretofore lived in comfort, and some in luxury, have found it necessary to sacrifice and economize in every possible way to make both ends meet, while there are enormous incomes which we scarcely touch and which go practically scot-free.

It might be interesting to note that in the fiscal year 1915, ending June 30, 1916, there were 120 people in the United States who had incomes exceeding $1,000,000. There were 329 who had incomes exceeding $500,000. There were 3,824 people who had incomes exceeding $100,000, and there were 54,154 people who had net incomes exceeding $15,000. These figures are for the fiscal year 1915. I have been unable to get from the department any similar statistics for 1916, but it is safe to say that the number of large incomes for 1916 were increased very materially over 1915, and it is likewise safe to assume that statistics from 1917 will show that the figures for 1915, starting as they are, will be much smaller than 1917.

While we are calling upon the young men of our country to sacrifice their lives, while we are conscripting the youth of the Nation to make up the necessary 100 per cent of human lives, would it be out of place to say that all the excess of all incomes over $15,000 should be conscripted and paid into the Treasury of the United States, leaving still the net untaxed balance of $15,000 in every case? Would it be a hardship upon anybody? Would it bring any suffering to anyone? Would it be as great a sacrifice to take all in excess of $15,000 as it is for a man to give his life, a father to give his son, a widow to give her first born? And yet, Mr. President, this amendment does not propose to take anywhere near all of this excess. An examination of the table that I shall append to my remarks will show that in every case more money is left net and untaxed than can be used in any possible legitimate expenditure in the support of the taxpayer and his family.

What is the objection even to the mild increase provided for by this amendment? It is insisted, in the first place, that it would interfere with business. Can this be true when nothing is taken but a portion of the income, leaving to the holder enough for himself and his family to live in luxury, while his fellow men, with their lives conscripted, are dying in the trenches of a foreign country? Would it interfere with business even if we took it all, providing only that the men whose incomes were taken are as patriotic as the man who offers his life? This amendment does not seek to take near all. It does not seek to take anything that by any possible construction could be held to be necessary for the support of the taxpayer and his family. It leaves them to live the same as they have always lived, while other citizens are compelled to not only give their incomes but to give up business, and if necessary life itself.

I have in mind an illustration, called recently to my attention, of a young man 27 years of age, who was the owner and publisher of a country newspaper. Through his own efforts and unceasing economy he had succeeded in placing it on a sound business basis. He owned a home, and had a wife and one small child. With the exception of a mortgage of $400 on his home, he was out of debt. He was making a comfortable living and saving a little money. He was a member of the National Guard, and when the order came to go he was unable to dispose of his business or to make any satisfactory arrangement for continuing the publication of his newspaper. He gave up his business, the result of years of toil, stored his printing outfit in the cellar of his home, and answered his country's call. To-day his wife is clerking in a store to support herself and child, while he is on his way to a foreign country to fight our common foe. In the ranks of our soldier boys there are hundreds of thousands of similar sacrifices made in behalf of our flag. When men have offered their lives, and given all their capital and all their income, is it unreasonable to say that those who are the possessors of enormous incomes shall not have at least a portion of it conscripted in support of our Government?

I know that there are many cases of patriotism exhibited by men of immense wealth. I am not complaining of the men because they are wealthy. I am glad that there are large incomes so that a portion of them can be taxed, and I am only asking common, ordinary justice in behalf of the men and women who have given up all they possess for the sake of our flag. I have had called to my attention some wonderful exhibitions of patriotism by men who are in possession of great incomes, and who are willing to donate their entire incomes to Red Cross and hospital work. If I could by any law exempt the incomes of such men I would do it. I have had letters by the hundreds from people who have said, "I am perfectly willing that my entire income, everything that I shall make during the war, shall be conscripted by the Government and used in the prosecution of the war. All I ask is that my business shall be left intact." This amendment would do that in every instance. I am satisfied that the increasing of the tax on incomes to a very much greater extent than is proposed in this amendment would meet with the most hearty and patriotic approval of the thousands of people whom it would affect. There are many patriotic business men all over our land who realize the terrible sacrifices that have been made, and must continue to be made, by their fellow citizens. They realize that the terrible expense of the war ought to be borne by those who can bear it with the least hardship. They do not expect to make a profit out of the war. They do not ask to do so. They are willing that incomes above a comfortable living should be conscripted, and they feel that even should this be done, they would not be doing their full share when compared with those who offer not only business but life itself.

When the question of conscription was before the Senate it was argued by those who favored the measure that although nearly all of our citizenship was patriotic, and that hundreds of thousands of loyal men were ready to volunteer to fight in foreign lands, yet they were in favor of conscription in order that we might, as they said, equalize the burden; that even though the men were willing to volunteer we should have a law that would conscript all of our citizens, so that no favorites could be played, and so that those who were willing to sacrifice should not be compelled to bear the burdens of those who were slackers. Why does not the same argument apply to the raising of revenue for the prosecution of the war, and why does it not apply now? There are many men of immense wealth who are willing to sacrifice all their profits for our country's cause, but if we permit the holders of such incomes to volunteer their money are we not permitting the holders of other incomes to become money slackers? If it was logical to conscript the manhood of our country so that all should bear the burdens equally, why is it not equally logical that we should conscript the incomes of the country?

It is claimed also that if we increase the amount of the tax as proposed by this amendment it will prevent many men from contributing to charity from their incomes—men who are now the chief supporters of some worthy religious, educational, and charitable institutions. It might have been said also of the conscription law that if we conscripted the young men of the country it would prevent other citizens from volunteering their services and going into the war without conscription. If we add to the taxes of the already overburdened poor, as this bill proposes, we increase the need and the necessity for charitable contributions. If we relieve this class of our citizens from taxation and increase the taxes on large incomes, we lessen the necessity for charity. If the proposed increase on incomes took all of the excess above a comfortable living, there would be some reason for this objection; but even then it would not be conclusive. Even then the same argument that was made against volunteering and in favor of conscription would apply. It may be that before this terrible crisis is past many of our private schools and even our public schools may be temporarily closed, because at whatever sacrifice and at whatever cost we must eventually bring honorable victory to our cause. The time may come when all the incomes above a living will be conscripted and men will not be allowed to volunteer their money even though they desire to do so, but will be compelled to submit to its conscription in order that it may be placed where the Government, under all of the conditions and circumstances, deems it to be most needed. When we examine this amendment and analyze the amount of the increased tax it proposes it seems to me almost ridiculous that the objection should be made to it that these men whose large incomes it affects will have their charitable inclinations perverted by its enactment. Those who urge this objection to the adoption of this amendment are, in my judgment, questioning the patriotism of the very men whose incomes they are trying to protect.

But let us look at some of these incomes and see whether the holders are going to be so poverty-stricken, if this amendment becomes a law, as to deprive them of any contribution to charity that otherwise they might be disposed to make. Would the man who has an income of $20,000, and who, if this amendment becomes a law, would have to pay a little over $1,000 thereof as a tax, be so poor that he would justly and honestly feel unable to make any charitable contribution? Would the man who has an income of $50,000, who would have more than $40,000 remaining after he had paid his tax, feel so poverty-stricken that it would be a hardship on him to contribute something to charity? Would the man with a million-dollar income, who under this proposed increase would be required to pay practically half of it as taxes, and would have, in round numbers, $500,000 left, feel so poor that he could not contribute to the support of the preacher?

It has been argued on the floor of the Senate that wealth has been patriotic. This I freely admit. In my judgment it would be just as erroneous to say that all wealthy men are slackers as it would be to say that all the citizens called by the draft law for service in the Army were slackers. If the drafting of men casts no suspicion upon their loyalty, then why should the drafting of money be claimed an attempt to charge the disloyalty of rich men? If the conscription of human beings is necessary to bring equality of service in our country's need, then why is not the conscription of incomes necessary to bring about equality in the distribution of the financial burden? If we will not wait for men to enlist, then why should we wait for wealth to donate? If we demand by law that there shall be equality of service where human lives are at stake, then why should we not demand by law equality of contribution when funds for the prosecution of the war are necessary?

There is not a single penny provided for by this amendment that can possibly work a hardship upon any person. There is no injustice in any of its requirements. It would be a tax less troublesome than any other we could devise, even if it were increased threefold, and until it or some similar provision is enacted into law and this equality of the burdens of taxation brought about, it is not fair nor just that we should levy, even in pennies, taxes upon the very necessities of life. Not only is the increase provided by this amendment equitable and will be practically unnoticed and unfelt by those who have to contribute their share from their incomes, but it must be remembered that this additional tax will be collected without a single extra penny of expense on the part of the Government. We already have the machinery in operation for the collection of the existing income tax, and this increase will be collected without a penny of additional cost. It will cost no more to collect $10 from an income than it now costs to collect $5. So all of the increase will be net to the Government.

The pending bill levies a tax upon the food that the mother must have to give nourishment to her unborn babe; it taxes the medicine that she administers during the weary hours of the night while she watches the struggle between life and death in the cradle at her side; it taxes the food necessary for the child to grow to manhood's strength, and if perchance the child is now grown and has answered his country's call to defend the flag this bill as it came into the Senate taxed every message of love that the mother sends to her fighting son. It levies a tax upon every Christmas present sent by loving friends to our soldiers on foreign soil.

We should not issue bonds until these surplus incomes are taxed not only to the extent provided in this amendment but to a much greater extent. We should not burden those who shall live after us with the payment of bonds so long as we have such immense incomes untaxed and unconscribed. When we issue bonds without first exhausting all reasonable means of taxation we are doing an injustice to posterity. Unborn generations will bend their backs in toil to pay for the mistakes that we make here. The bonds that we issue now will be a burden a hundred years after we have passed away and are forgotten. For every dollar that we get by the issuing of bonds posterity must pay at least two. We owe it to those who shall live after us not to shoulder upon them any debt that could have been paid with ease and without discomfort by the holders of the immense incomes of to-day. We will not do our duty to our country or to future generations if we mortgage the future by issuing bonds before we tax all the immense fortunes of the present day, to the extent at least of taking that part of the income which is not necessary to the comfort or pleasure or even the luxury of its owner.

Objection has been urged against increasing the taxes on incomes because it is claimed that such a course would make the war unpopular. It has been argued on this floor that those who favor increasing the tax on large incomes are in reality interfering with and injuring the prosecution of the war. Mr. President, exactly the opposite is true. In the face of the record I do not see how any patriotic citizen can argue and make even himself believe that these large incomes should not be taxed at least as high as is provided in this amendment. If we want to make the war unpopular, we should pass this bill as it was introduced, and thus provide that increased burdens should be laid upon the backs of millions of our citizens who are already striving to the utmost to make a living. If we want to make the war unpopular, then we should, as the unamended bill provides, tax coffee, tea, sugar, cocoa, parcel-post shipments, letters, freight receipts, and all the other necessities of life, and then pay the balance by issuing bonds. Nothing will make the people dissatisfied quicker. Nothing will bring disorganization and dissatisfaction sooner than to add even a penny of tax to those already overburdened, and relieve those whose incomes permit them to live in luxury, without the ability, in any legitimate way, even to spend the money that annually comes to them, in many cases without any effort on their part. To fight this war to a successful termination we ought to have a satisfied and happy people. We ought to arrange our taxation so that its burdens will not fall upon the poor but the cost of the war be paid for to as great an extent as is possible by those from whom it can be taken without leaving any tinge of cold or hunger or suffering in its trail. We should eliminate from this bill every tax upon the necessities of life and confine it to incomes, war profits, and luxuries. Unless we do, we will bring dissatisfaction and discontent to millions of our citizens. It has been the history of the world that war has been one of the principal instrumentalities for building up immense fortunes. So true has this been that the owners of great wealth who are unscrupulous have often used their great influence to bring on war. There has never yet been a war where the bulk of the burden has not fallen on the poor and those of ordinary circumstances, while others have built up immense fortunes. Millions of people all over the civilized world, even before this war began, were toiling to pay bonds that had been issued for the carrying on of prior wars. If we set before the world a new example for the future—that of paying the expenses of war by taxing war profits and huge incomes—we will take the greatest step toward international peace that has ever been taken in the history of the world. Let it be known that war profits and large incomes must pay the bulk of the expense of the war and peace will come much sooner than it otherwise would, and if it be known that this precedent, thus established, is going to be followed as to all future wars, and that henceforth there will be no war profits, then war will become almost extinct, and the nations of the world will live together in perpetual peace. When once the great and powerful influences of wealth have been lined up in opposition to war the peace of the world will be practically assured, and the influences of wealth will be so lined up when there is no longer any financial profit in war. When once it becomes known all over the civilized world that the conscription of men means conscription of money as well, there will be no more conscription, and when armies must be recruited entirely from volunteers, there will be no more wars of conquest, and it will not be possible for ambitious monarchs to obtain either money or men to destroy the lives and liberty of the innocent people of other nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may print as an appendix to my remarks a copy of the amendment and also a table showing the amount of revenue that would be raised from the various incomes up to a million dollars if this amendment were adopted, and also showing what amount of tax would be paid on the same income in England. In this connection I wish to call attention to the fact that in England up to $13,000 it is impossible to compute what the income would be unless you know what kind of an income it is, because they have unearned and earned incomes, and up to and including $12,000 the rates for unearned and earned dividends are different. From that on they are the same. My table will show the amount of the English incomes from $13,000 up to a million. I wish to add, however, Mr. President, that from the incomes that are omitted from the table for the reason that I have stated, as far as Great Britain is concerned, there would in every case be a much larger amount paid than under our law if this amendment were adopted, regardless of whether the incomes were derived from unearned sources or earned sources, or from both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out section 2 of the bill and insert:

Sec. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

One-half of 1 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000.

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $7,000.

One and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,000 and does not exceed $8,000.

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $8,000 and does not exceed $9,000.

Two and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $9,000 and does not exceed $10,000.

Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $11,000.

Three and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $11,000 and does not exceed $12,000.

Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,000 and does not exceed $13,000.

Four and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $13,000 and does not exceed $14,000.

Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $14,000 and does not exceed $15,000.

Five and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $16,000.

Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $16,000 and does not exceed $17,000.

Six and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $17,000 and does not exceed $18,000.

Seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $18,000 and does not exceed $19,000.

Seven and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $19,000 and does not exceed $20,000.

Eight and one-quarter per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $21,000.

Nine per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $21,000 and does not exceed $22,000.

Nine and three-quarter per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $22,000 and does not exceed $23,000.

Ten and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $23,000 and does not exceed $24,000.

Eleven and one-quarter per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $24,000 and does not exceed $25,000.

Twelve per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $25,000 and does not exceed $26,000.

Twelve and three-quarter per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $26,000 and does not exceed $27,000.

Thirteen and one-half per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $27,000 and does not exceed $28,000.

Fourteen and one-quarter per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $28,000 and does not exceed $29,000.

Fifteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $29,000 and does not exceed $30,000.

Sixteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $31,000.

Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $31,000 and does not exceed $32,000.

Eighteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $32,000 and does not exceed $33,000.

Nineteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $33,000 and does not exceed $34,000.

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $34,000 and does not exceed $35,000.

Twenty-one per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $35,000 and does not exceed $36,000.

Twenty-two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $36,000 and does not exceed $37,000.

Twenty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $37,000 and does not exceed $38,000.

Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $38,000 and does not exceed $39,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, there is so much confusion and uncertainty about all statistics relative to conditions which now obtain as compared with conditions before the war that in some cases, and particularly the one to which I am going to address myself now, they are disastrous and absolutely unjust. Certain individuals and certain interests, it seems, are creating the impression that Germany is receiving aid from neutral sources in the form of certain productions of America. I took occasion the other day, when certain matter was introduced in the Record tending to show that southern cotton was reaching Germany, to demonstrate that it was untrue and physically impossible, if the neutrals and our allies were consuming anything like their normal prewar amount of cotton. The agitation of that question and the subsequent placing of an embargo upon cotton have resulted in a loss of $30 a bale on cotton within three weeks, while the production of American cotton is 30 per cent below the normal and the price is but 40 per cent above the normal.

I sent to the Bureau of the Census and asked them to give me the exact figures of cotton production from 1913 to 1916, inclusive—one prewar year and three war years—and also to give me the consumption of cotton during the four years named. The cotton-consumption year differs from the producing year in that the consumption year begins on August 1 and extends to August 1 next, while the producing year is the calendar year. I ask the privilege of putting into the Record the letter of Mr. Rogers and the statistics furnished, and I want to give the Senate the benefit of what those figures show.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, September 5, 1917.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your request, I take pleasure in furnishing you the inclosed statement relative to the production and consumption of cotton in the United States and throughout the world. The figures for the United States are as collected and compiled by this bureau, those for the world have been compiled from a number of sources and contain some estimates, as definite information is not available for all countries.

Trusting that this statement may be of service to you, I am,
Very truly, yours,

SAM. L. ROGERS, Director.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, a few weeks ago certain communications from New England manufacturers were introduced and read into the Record in reference to cotton finding its way to Germany.

I gathered statistics from the departments at that time to show that this was a mistake. Presumably upon the fear that the suggestion that cotton was going to Germany was true, cotton was included in the embargo. Beginning with the agitation of this question, and since the placing of cotton upon the embargo list, the price has declined $30 per bale. The impression is abroad that the present price of cotton is above all reason and is affected like other commodities by war conditions; this is absolutely untrue. According to the law of supply and demand, under normal conditions, freed from manipulation, cotton to-day, without the war, would be worth upon its merits, according to the law of supply and demand, a much higher price than it is now bringing.

I called upon the Census Department to furnish me with the figures first showing the growth or production of cotton for the years 1913 to 1916, inclusive. The total production of American cotton for the four years was 54,239,000 bales, including linters. The consumption of American cotton for the same period was 55,400,000 bales, showing a consumption exceeding production of 1,161,000 bales.

The world's production of cotton for the same period, according to the figures of the Census Bureau, was 85,205,000 bales. The world's consumption of all cotton produced was 86,750,000 bales, showing an excess of consumption over production of 1,545,000 bales.

Mr. STONE. Where did that come from?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was carried over from previous years. I shall show later on just what the condition now is.

The average consumption of American cotton per year for the four years named is 13,800,000 bales, whilst the average production is 13,500,000 bales, making the excess of consumption over production for each year 300,000 bales.

The consumption of the world's production averages 21,680,000 bales; the world's production averages 21,301,000 bales, showing an excess of consumption over production of practically the same amount—300,000 bales.

Taking the production and consumption year by year for each of the four years, taking one prewar year, 1913, and three war years, 1914, 1915, and 1916, the following table shows that there was produced of American cotton in 1913, including linters, 14,156,000 bales, consumed 14,080,000 bales; in 1914 produced 16,258,000 bales, consumed 13,390,000 bales; in 1915 produced 11,569,000 bales, consumed 14,340,000 bales; in 1916 produced 12,226,000 bales, consumed 13,590,000 bales.

The production of American cotton for the five years previous to the war, including 1914, averaged 14,000,000 bales per year, whilst the average for 1915 and 1916—the two last years of the war—was only 11,200,000, or a falling off from the average of 3,000,000 bales per year for the two years.

To put it more graphically, in 1915 we produced 11,068,000 bales and the world consumed 14,340,000 bales; in 1916 we produced 11,363,000 bales and the world consumed 13,590,000 bales, consuming in the two years all the surplus stock carried over from all the previous years; and, according to the figures furnished by the Census Department, we are to-day absolutely bare of all old cotton and are dependent upon the present incoming crop to supply the needs of the world.

Never before did such a condition as that confront the textile world in the history of cotton. We have wiped out the surplus, not on account of the increased consumption but on account of the disasters to production, which has dropped from 16,000,000 bales to 11,000,000 bales.

On September 1 the Agricultural Department gave out its condition report; and its estimate of the yield for this incoming year is 12,500,000 bales of American cotton. The average world's consumption, including America, of American cotton from 1914 to 1917, inclusive, is 13,800,000 bales, according to the figures furnished by the Census Department. If the estimate of the Agricultural Department is approximately correct, and the same demand for consumption continues, we will before the 1st day of next August be one and a half million bales short of the necessary supply to meet the demand.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will it inconvenience the Senator from South Carolina for me to inquire of him the number of bales of cotton that are usually consumed by the countries that are now prohibited from receiving cotton from the United States?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state, in round numbers, that formerly Germany received about 3,000,000 bales.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I mean the neutral countries. I understand, under the embargo which has been laid, cotton can not go to Germany; but my inquiry is with reference to the neutral countries of Europe against whom the embargo also operates.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Those countries consume about 4,000,000 bales.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But no cotton is being shipped to those countries now at all?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, yes; cotton will be shipped, but only in proportion to their normal supply; none in excess of their prewar shipments.

The Senator will understand how the confusion arose in reference to that. When the great port of Bremen and other great German ports that formerly received American cotton, not alone for Germany but for other countries, and whose receipts of cotton appear in our tables, were closed, cotton found its way to lesser neutral ports, and immediately some said it was going to Germany. It was not hard to trace the source of this report, because the difference between the price of the raw material and the finished product is the margin of profit for those who convert the raw material into the finished product. I shall take occasion on the floor of the Senate to show that brown domestic bleached cloth, sheeting, and prints are selling to-day on a basis of 50 cents a pound for the raw cotton and the manufacturers are making a bigger profit than they made when they bought cotton at 10 cents a pound. I have asked the Department of Commerce and the Federal Trade Commission to furnish me a table, and if they can not furnish it I am going to get it myself from the merchants, showing the difference between what these goods were bringing in 1913 and what they are bringing now; yet there is no embargo threatened on manufactured cloth.

In 1910, which was, of course, a prewar year, the average price of cotton was 14 cents per pound. In 1913 we made 14,156,000 bales of cotton, and the average price was 12.5 cents per pound, a difference of 40 per cent between the price then and the price now, it being 40 per cent higher now than it was then.

In 1916 the production of cotton was 11,068,000 bales, exclusive of linters; compared with the production of 1913, it is a decrease of 30 per cent, showing that the decrease in production is just 10 per cent less than the increase in price. In 1910 cotton went to 20 cents per pound in New York. In 1913 it went above 15 cents per pound. On the basis of supply and demand comparing the production and the price of 1915-16 with the production and price of 1912-13, cotton is cheaper to-day than it was then.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he has any remedy for the unfortunate economic or business ill which he is discussing? The embargo will not be taken from cotton. Does the Senator think there are malign influences here at home that are working on the market and causing the depression? It is a pretty serious question to your constituents and mine.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My opinion is that there are selfish influences at work here—

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no doubt about that myself.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And I suspect that there are some foreign influences collaborating with home influences, operating to create an impression against the cotton producer. I will discuss that a little later on.

The prewar consumption of American cotton of our allies was, in round numbers, 6,000,000 bales. The American consumption now is 7,000,000 bales, making a total of 13,000,000 bales. If the estimate of the Agricultural Department is too little by one-half million bales of cotton, and we should make this year 13,000,000 bales of cotton, then there will be just enough to supply the prewar requisites of America and her allies without leaving a single bale on the 1st day of next August, to say nothing of the normal demand of other countries of the world.

The situation justifies a much higher price for cotton than now obtains. According to figures obtained from the department, the cost of production has advanced between 75 and 100 per cent; the cost of farm implements, labor, live-stock food, and fertilizers have increased 100 per cent, or in the neighborhood thereof, while the price of cotton has increased 40 per cent over the prewar price and the production has decreased 30 per cent below the prewar production.

The situation is entirely in the hands of the farmers of the South. It is only a question of whether or not they will sell their cotton for lower prices or be stampeded by the gerrymandered figures that are put around and about or by appeals to their patriotism on spurious grounds, because the most favorable condition that ever confronted the cotton farmer is before him to-day; he is master of the situation. I do not believe that he wants to extort any more than a just return on the intrinsic value of the commodity he produces. If cloth sells upon the basis of 50 cents a pound for cotton, and he has got to buy his cotton back in the form of a shirt, if mules have advanced 100 per cent, if food has advanced 100 per cent, surely he is entitled to a reasonable advance, especially in view of the fact that disasters have cut his production down from 30 to 40 per cent.

Mr. President, I shall at another time show that prices obtained now for cotton goods justify the mills in paying a much higher price than they are now paying for raw cotton. Taking the supply and consumption now as compared with normal, cotton is the cheapest article of all the necessities on the market to-day and is not bringing its intrinsic worth.

Mr. President, I wanted to put these facts in the RECORD, because day before yesterday cotton broke $6 a bale upon the presumption that some of it was finding its way to Germany and that the Government would have to license exports. What England alone will take and what America alone will consume will not leave out of this year's production the normal carry-over stock that justifies the trade in selling goods ahead. If necessity requires, if this assault on the cotton market on these spurious grounds does not stop, I think there is a way of finding out just where the influence is and exposing it on the floor of the Senate.

If the production of cotton was normal and the price was double the normal and I believed that cotton for munition purposes was filtering through to our enemy, I would stand before the Senate and fight that condition as every other patriotic American would do; but when certain influences, right at the debt-paying time of the poor producer, rig the market on gerrymandered figures, manipulated figures, which the reports of the department here prove incorrect, it is the patriotic duty of every man, to say nothing of those from the South, to stand up here and give this great world necessity a fair show. Because cotton happens to be selling for from 20 to 25 cents a pound men look upon it as being an abnormal price. As I have said before, it went to 20 cents a pound in 1910. Why? Because in 1910 we made exactly the crop, lacking a few thousand bales, that we made in 1915, and it went to 20 cents a pound with a carry-over stock from previous years of something like 3,000,000 bales. In 1915 we made 11,000,000 bales; in 1916, 11,363,000 bales; while the world's consumption was 14,000,000 bales. When it is considered that 900,000,000 people consume American cotton in the way of wearing apparel and necessary textile articles and that America has a monopoly of the world's production, there is just basis for a higher price for cotton than prevails to-day. On no other spot on the globe except the United States is the peculiar American middling upland duplicated. Under the microscope test all the tropical and semitropical and foreign cottons are shown to be radically different in their mechanical and physical make-up.

I have in my office a report from the British Cotton Growers' Association, from Mr. Arthur Capper, in which he said before that association that India, which is practically a dependency of England, produced 4,000,000 bales of cotton, and out of the 4,000,000 bales of cotton produced in India the great mills of Manchester, Lancashire, Oldham, Lyons, and Leeds only used 200,000 bales, because the fiber was so short and coarse that it was only fit for cordage; and he said further that the only hope of England to maintain her supremacy in the great cloth markets of the world was American cotton, because of its superior quality, lending itself to the loom. And now, when disaster, insects, and seasons have added burdens on the producers of cotton, when advance in wages, advance in food, fertilizer, and farming implements have increased the cost of production 100 per cent, these pirates and selfish foreign interests combine for the purpose of creating a scare in America and urge that the strong hand of the embargo ought to be laid on it in order to restrict cotton from going to Germany! I suspect that the real purpose is not so much to prohibit it, because they know that it is not going, as to force it to go to certain countries abroad for their benefit and for the benefit of certain home manufacturers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Lewis in the chair). Will the Senator from South Carolina allow the Chair to ask him a question for information, which the Chair is sure will be interesting?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from South Carolina give the Chair his judgment as to what effect, if any, the proposed production of cotton in the fields of China, Africa, and Egypt is likely to have upon the southern cotton production?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In 1867 a citizen of my city was employed by the Russian Government to go over to exploit cotton in Russia. At that time cotton was bringing $1.89 a pound in gold. He tried with all of his southern training to grow cotton in the seemingly favorable lands of Russian territory, and failed egregiously, because even from American seed it would not reproduce American fiber under the climatic conditions of that country. As everybody knows, in the case of the Egyptian cotton every foot of ground that will produce the long, silken fiber has been exploited. Egypt can grow no more cotton, according to the report of Mr. Arthur Capper, the president of the British Cotton Growers' Association. India can only grow a little short, half-inch fiber, fit only for coarse cordage and bags. Argentina produces a form of cotton that approximates the low grades of American cotton. The world has been tested, and nowhere else do the climatic conditions from the dewpoint and humidity and peculiar soil conditions produce what is known as American upland middling.

Why, Mr. President, it might be instructive here—and I will say this in closing—to reflect that we of America do not appreciate what we have in the way of a world monopoly of a world's necessity. Under the loose weave and the use of aniline dyes, cotton has entered the domain of wool, and practically is a substitute for it. When we used vegetable dyes it would fade under the influence of the weather; but with the use of aniline dyes the colors are fast, so that it will take an expert to tell the difference between "all cotton and a yard wide" and "all wool and a yard wide." Under the tight weave in the modern laundry it has practically driven flax out of the domain of clothing. Under the mercerized process it has taken the place of silk. They are the only three competitors it has in the world—flax, wool, and silk.

Wool is only wool, and you can not make anything else out of it. Flax is only flax—coarse, brilliant, flexible fiber—but you can only make flax out of it. Silk is the product of the worm, and it is so fine and attenuated that it can only be made into silk. But cotton can be made into flax, wool, and silk. If every silk-worm were destroyed, and the sheep failed to bear wool, and flaxseed were unknown to mankind, you could still have flax, wool, and silk.

Not only is this true, but we can furnish you with butter, lard, fertilizer, shoe soles, rubber, leather, paint, bread, and meat out of the seed. And yet it is not properly appreciated because it happens to be produced in that despised section of the United States—I use the word "despised" in its etymological sense—that section that was stripped of its credit and its capital and left to work out its own destiny under the most adverse circumstances that ever fell with crushing weight upon a civilized people. Had it been any other section, where capital was easy to obtain and where the ability of the producer had been such that he could have distributed it as the world needed it, a dollar a pound would look dirt cheap to-day. And yet, during all these years, cotton has held the balance of trade in favor of America. Eight hundred million dollars last year came into America in the form of European gold or gold exchange in exchange for raw cotton sent abroad, to say nothing of the seed products and the by-products.

Our friends on the other side have built a great breastwork of protection around this country in order that home production might bring its fullest return and engage labor, while God himself built a wall around the most priceless gift ever vouchsafed to mankind, and put the clothing of the world in the hands of America; and yet we stand here and aid and abet our commercial enemies in fleecing us of our birthright.

I have advocated keeping the exchanges open because I believed that a great concentrated market place, where buyer and seller might meet, was a commercial necessity. But if the market places of this country are to be turned into dens of gamblers and those who reck of nothing except the profits that go into their own pockets, then perhaps we had better let buyer and seller come together, the actual producer and the actual consumer, without this convenient intermediary, because unless the transaction is conducted honestly and fairly it should not be conducted at all.

Pick up the morning newspaper. I read yesterday where a shower in Texas, the 1st of September, had caused a break in the market of about 70 points, when any man who knows enough about cotton to even call the name knows that all the rain that could fall from now until next planting season would not add a bale to the crop. The period of incubation is from the time the little shape forms to the open bloom, 20 days; from the bloom to the grown boll, 20 days; from the grown boll to the maturity of the seed and fiber, 20 days; so that if your Texas crop were to fill itself with shapes to-day frost would blight your bolls before they were mature; and yet in those dens in New York and New Orleans if a rain falls in December it is an excuse to break the market.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] asked me what remedy I would use. I was instrumental in writing into the new banking and currency law the amendment to section 13 that gave farm products the same standing in regard to the issuance of Federal reserve notes that prime commercial paper and foreign acceptances had, so that, with the proper reserve of gold in our banks, I could take my cotton and put it in a warehouse and have Federal reserve notes issued for six months to me, the owner of the real wealth, capitalize it to a certain per cent of its value, and enable me to meet my obligations. I hope the farmers will take advantage of that situation now and if there is such a plethora of cotton as these gentlemen seem to think justifies a drop of $30 a bale, hold it from the market, and let us see if they can spin cloth out of tissue paper or future contracts.

I know there are Senators on this floor, honest and patriotic men, not one of whom will sit idly by and see an injustice worked upon the South and the producers of cotton, to say nothing of depleting the income from abroad that its value justifies.

No, friends! Holding the balance of trade in our favor for 43 years, making us a creditor nation in place of a debtor nation, sending two bales out of every three abroad! Sixty-odd per cent of all the liquid capital of England is invested in cotton manufactories. Her prosperity and welfare depend upon the seasons in America, and yet the price of our monopoly, the price of American cotton, is fixed in Liverpool, instead of being fixed in the South, at the seat of production!

It is that for which I am fighting—that the section that produces this marvelous product shall receive such a price, based on its intrinsic value, as will in the near future enable them to price the product of their own sweat and toil, and not leave it to an Englishman who would not know a cotton stalk from a Jimson weed.

I have been at this fight since I have been in the Senate, not because it is cotton but because of what, under the transformation of energy, cotton spells to America, and because it is right. The potentialities that rest in it have never even been approached.

Take steel, produced the world over, and under the manipulation of proper capital combined, and the genius of organization, the price doubles and quadruples. Take wheat, produced the world around, and under the manipulation of capital and organization the price doubles. In the case of those articles they have competitors in every country within the temperate zone. On the other hand, cotton, without a competitor on God's earth, with 900,000,000 people dependent upon it for clothing and textile products, is absolutely left at the mercy of him who purchases and converts it and makes the profit out of it. It is a reflection on America, on her men, and on the spirit which, thank God, is rapidly passing—the division between the sections.

Mr. President, at another time in the near future, as soon as I can get the facts together, I am going to stand here and show that the manufacturers of this country are making bigger profits out of 27-cent cotton than they ever made out of 10-cent cotton. The man that produces it is entitled to his fair and square deal under the law of supply and demand.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, when the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] called attention to this question some days ago, I then expressed the fear that what has happened would happen. The disastrous consequence of this event cast its gloomy shadow before. The tragedy of the situation is in the fact that the man who has devoted 12 long, weary, arduous months of work to produce this cotton—who has suffered the most heartrending abnegation, self-denial, and poverty, who with his wife and children have toiled and sacrificed with the hope that their efforts would be rewarded with a price that would enable him to provide his family with the necessities of life—is now confronted with the soul-crushing disappointment of having the price of his cotton reduced something like $30 per bale, with a fair prospect of falling lower still.

You who are blessed with plenty, who have never been confronted with the specter of want, may be able to imagine the feelings that well up in the breast of a fond father and devoted mother—the small farmer with 3 bales, 5 bales, or 10 bales of cotton, the product of a year's work, just at this time when he must dispose of his cotton in order to raise money with which to meet his maturing notes in the bank or liquidate his account "at the store," credits which have been extended to him in making his crop—imagine if you can how he feels when compelled to part with his cotton at this disappointingly low price—a price which the Senator from South Carolina has demonstrated is far below the value of the product. Do you not think it is enough to "repress the noble rage" and "freeze the genial current of the soul" in the most patriotic and loyal citizen of this Republic?

Oh, the rarity of that charity so scarce and yet so much needed in this world to-day. Think of the blighted lives, the frustrated ambitions, and the blasted hopes which this fall in the price of cotton will produce on the women and children in the cotton-growing sections of this great country. Do not forget that $30 a bale is the difference between independence and want—the difference between plenty and poverty.

I have no doubt but that cotton will go back again to a fair price, but I predict that it will be after it passes out of the hands of the patient man who toiled to produce it. The embargo on cotton in 1915, placed by the English Government in violation of international law, worked the same ravages and robberies upon the cotton farmers of the South that will result from the embargo on cotton in the year 1917. It may be that it is necessary to place this embargo on cotton in order to keep it from the enemy's country. I do not believe it is. I believe the sentiment that has provoked this talk about cotton "going to the enemy's country" originated with certain individuals who desire to buy cotton cheap for the cotton mills of this country, and of England, France, and Italy. I am afraid there is more personal pecuniary profits than patriotic considerations in this matter.

Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina has made a statement that is not absolutely correct and sustained by the facts in the case, I hope some Senator will call attention to such mistakes. For God's sake let us have the truth about this matter. Let justice be done though the heavens fall. This question affects the life—the physical, mental, moral, and financial well being of nine-tenths of the people in my State. In it is involved a tragedy almost as deep, dark, and potential of evil as war itself. The able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a few days ago called attention to the fact that during the English-Boer War it was discovered that among the laboring classes of England the manhood had been dwarfed and weakened because of a lack of nourishment due to bad economic conditions. The strength of this Republic consists in the physical strength, moral character, and intellectual development of the individual man.

There is no doubt of the truth in those lines from Oliver Goldsmith:

A bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroy'd can never be supplied.

America can not be strong and great unless the men who toil and produce the wealth of the country are given an opportunity for the development of the latent powers of the mind and strength of the body. They must be given a chance in the race of life. Upon these more than any other class of our population depend the peace and permanency of American institutions.

I shall not go as far as the Senator from South Carolina has gone in offering advice to the farmers to hold their cotton. I am rather of the opinion that his judgment is correct—it may be better to hold the cotton. God knows I wish I could tell them what they ought to do, but I do not know whether cotton is going to become cheaper or that it may go back to the price of two weeks ago. Conscious of my own limitations, I hesitate to assume the responsibility of advising them. But I do know that a majority of the cotton farmers in my State have suffered sorely and disastrously from the effects of this war. I know they have obligations which they are compelled to meet. These obligations are maturing now and their only means of raising money to meet them is by selling their cotton. I would not ask for them any special advantage. They desire only a square deal.

But I am apprehensive that the same power that forced the price down $30 per bale may drive it down still further. The solution of the problem is beyond my mental ken. I only hope and pray for the best.

Yes; it is a tragedy, and calls for serious executive and congressional consideration. Something ought to be done. I hope the President may order somebody with authority and a will to make a careful investigation of all the facts in the case, and I am sure he will when he is brought to a realization of what it means.

I have stated heretofore that if cotton is going to the enemy's country let it be stopped, cut it off regardless of the consequences to my constituents; but if it is discovered that it is only a scheme or subterfuge on the part of the mill owners to rob the farmers of the South, then in the name of justice let the truth be published and the calamity averted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we are confronted by abnormal conditions. These abnormal conditions require abnormal legislative acts. We are in the world war, the greatest conflict that has ever been participated in by humanity since the world began. I hoped that we could keep out of it. I did everything that I felt I patriotically could to keep us out of it, but we got in. We are in it now. It has ceased to be, so far as we are concerned, a European war. It is the war of the United States. It is a war by the American people, in which the American people are engaged, and it must be fought out by us until a peace satisfactory to us can be had.

I am not concerned now with the differences before it began. I want to do everything possible to bring it to a successful and speedy close. I want every power, every resource of men and money of the United States to be mobilized, concentrated, and used most effectively to bring victory to our cause, and a lasting and honorable peace.

In a Fourth of July address I said that there are just two classes of people in this country—patriots and traitors. Those were my sentiments then. They are my sentiments now. A man must be for this country or against it. I believe that the great, overwhelming mass of our people are with the country. They are standing by the Government. They propose to stand by the Government, and they want the Government to use whatever means and whatever measures are necessary to carry on this war with the utmost vigor. And they are willing to make every sacrifice to that end.

Mr. President, on yesterday the able and brilliant Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] expressed the view that this war would be over within two months or that it would last two years. My recollection is that he said we would have peace within two months or the war would last two years; and, as I understood his position, it was that we should take our measures of preparation for the prosecution of this war upon the idea that we would have peace within two months. God grant that we may have peace within two months.

But, Mr. President, with all due respect to my very good friend from Illinois, with all due respect to his ability and his judgment, I think that to follow a course like that would be the height of folly. I believe that we ought to make our preparations upon the basis that this is going to be a war of months, if not of years; that to make our preparations upon the basis that this war is going to close within two months, or in the hope that it is going to close within two months, is akin to "watchful waiting," that is fraught with the most dire consequences to our people and to our country.

Mr. President, I may be wrong, but in my judgment this war will not close in two months. I have no hope of its closing in two months. I do not believe there is any basis of hope for its closing in two months. We ought not to deceive ourselves with reference to this war and with reference to what confronts us. We ought not to deceive the American people with reference to what confronts them in the conduct of this war.

Mr. President, in my judgment, Russia is out of this war. If she does not make a separate peace by next spring, she will at any rate not be an aggressive, potential force in it; and, in my judgment, we shall see the armies of Germany and Austria that are now along the eastern front or going into Russia facing our armies and our allies on the western front, and it will be necessary for us to break through not only the armies that are there now but the armies that are now confronting and destroying the power of Russia.

Again, Mr. President, let us not deceive ourselves as to with whom we are at war. We are not at war with the Kaiser. We are at war with Germany. Let us not depend upon the German people to overthrow their Government represented in or by the Kaiser. In my judgment, Mr. President, we must conquer the German people and the German Government before we will have a peace along the lines laid down now. We must face that fact, Mr. President. We must face the fact that the German people have stood by their Government, as represented by the Kaiser, as no people have stood by any government or its representatives before in the history of the world. They feel that they are fighting for their very existence. That is the problem that we must meet—a united people behind their government and behind their representatives, who, as a matter of fact, are really resentful that we should attempt to control and dictate to them in their internal affairs. We must fight this war on battle fields of their choosing, not of ours. Our armies must be sent 3,000 miles away; they must be kept supplied with arms, munitions, clothing, food, and reinforcements. It is a huge task. It should not be minimized. If our people know what is before them they will bravely face it.

That is the way that I look at this conflict. Those are the conditions we face. We can not win the war by concealing the facts and dangers; we can not win it by boasting that we will win it. To win it will require every ounce of man power, every ounce of money power, and every ounce of resource that our people and this Nation can get together.

Mr. President, during the discussion of this bill there have been suggestions that I resent. There have been intimations and suggestions, if not assertions, that those who urge the taking of more of the incomes and profits of our people are unpatriotic; that they want to make this war unpopular; that they want to make this legislation unpopular.

Mr. President, an argument like that indicates a lack of merit, to say the least of it and speak mildly, in the cause of those who suggest it. Simply because I may not agree with some one else as to the best method of carrying on this war is certainly no basis upon which I can be charged with being disloyal.

A statement of this character was made by the honored chairman of the committee, for whom I have the highest regard and the highest respect, in which I do not believe that he really meant what he suggested. I do not believe that in his heart he meant what his language has been construed by the press to mean, and yet they were warranted from the language used in drawing the conclusion they did. In the Washington Post on the morning after this address was delivered there was a column with great headlines like this:

Charges disloyalty—SIMMONS says high-tax men seek to make war unpopular.

Mr. President, I resent any such suggestion as that. I think it is very improper upon the floor of the Senate or anywhere else.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the Senator from North Carolina did not exactly mean that, because a few days afterwards he brought into the Senate a proposition imposing a higher tax. He evidently saw the error of his way and in part corrected the mistake he had made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, Mr. President; but I see nothing in the papers suggesting anything about that. These broad headlines went out to the country, and these headlines are about all that a great many people of the country would remember. They would simply jump to the conclusion that the Senator from North Carolina had charged many of his colleagues on this floor with disloyalty, and many seeing that would go on and state that they were disloyal. Many would accept the statement made here as a statement of fact, without considering the circumstances under which the words were uttered or what was really said, and the result is hatred, intolerance and abuse, and absolute injustice.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That speech, as the Senator will recall, was made when the chairman of the Finance Committee and his colleagues were insisting that upon the original bill presented they had gone the very limit of taxation, and that anything beyond what they then went was disloyal. Then the next day they went half a billion dollars beyond it, and so they reached the same category that they were then criticizing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true; but the papers have said nothing about that. The papers have not called attention to the fact that the majority of the committee have become disloyal and have been seeking to make their own tax bill unpopular to the people of this country, and they have not been, unless those of us who have been trying to increase it are disloyal.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from California has just remarked that the committee increased in their amendment the amount of revenue half a billion dollars. I know the Senator does not mean to be unfair. Does he realize that $435,000,000 of that revenue will be raised by taxing other corporations than were intended in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is the statement denied that they increased substantially the tax bill by half a billion dollars?

Mr. GERRY. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then that is the statement that I made, and it is not gainsaid. I do not understand what the Senator means when he makes the suggestion that he knows I do not wish to be unfair. Of course I do not, and of course the Senator does not.

Mr. GERRY. Probably I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I said they had increased the revenues by half a billion dollars, substantially, after they had said to the Senate that in the original bill, without the half billion dollars, they had gone the limit of taxation.

Mr. GERRY. If I misunderstood the Senator, I am very glad to be corrected. As I understood the Senator, I understood him to say that that amount had been raised by increasing the amount of the levy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It has been raised by increased taxation.

Mr. GERRY. Then I misunderstood the Senator. But what I wanted to make clear was that the $435,000,000 of that half billion has been raised by the amendment in regard to the 10 per cent allowance. In other words, it came from persons, copartnerships, and corporations that were not taxed under the original proposal of the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator why they were not taxed? The chairman of the committee said that the committee had gone as far as they could afford to go, and that to go any further would make the war unpopular. Then the chairman came in with the proposition to increase the tax. Was it the purpose of the committee by this last amendment to make the war unpopular, or have they found something to tax about which they knew nothing before? Regardless of the purpose of the committee I am glad of the change of front. The country will approve it, as the Senate has already approved it.

Mr. GERRY. If the Senator from Washington will allow me, I will be glad to answer that question. The original theory on which the committee brought in the bill was to tax war profits, and then, with an additional demand for revenue by the different departments, it was decided advisable to raise more money, and they did that by making the bill an excess-profits bill instead of a war-profits bill. That is really the distinction. I thank the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want the majority of the committee to understand that I am not charging them with disloyalty. I want them to understand that I am not charging them with attempting to make their bill unpopular. Not at all. I know they are not disloyal. I do not think they have been trying to make their bill unpopular. But I do say that if they are justified in their charge against those of us who have been seeking to increase the taxes to be raised under the bill as being disloyal or seeking to make the war unpopular, then they have actually done that very thing and are convicted out of their own mouths. But I know they are not disloyal; I know they are not unpatriotic, and I join in the encomiums which have been passed on the committee for their painstaking and earnest work in connection with the preparation of this bill. I know it is a hard bill to prepare. I know they had serious problems to meet. All I am objecting to is that because somebody on this floor dares to have a different opinion from them as to what ought to be done they are to be held up before the country as disloyal and unpatriotic.

While it is a little out of the line of what I rose to say, I want to refer to a suggestion that has been made time and time again on this floor, that they have increased or permitted an increase in this bill because of the belated estimates coming down from the department.

Mr. President, you can hardly use parliamentary language in view of the facts with reference to a suggestion of that sort. This bill was reported on the 6th day of August. What are the facts? On page 95 of the minority report there is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to the chairman of the committee, dated July 27, nearly two weeks before this report was submitted, in which the Secretary of the Treasury sends down an estimate of over $5,000,000,000, and while the majority report says that the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 were $5,693,958,000 on the 6th day of August, in this letter of the 27th of July the Secretary of the Treasury says that the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 are $10,735,807,000.

Oh, no, Mr. President, they can not lay this proposition on the department. These estimates were here, they were before the committee, and if there is any criticism to make of the committee it is that they did not take these increased estimates into account in framing their bill before they reported it to us.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. On the 2d of July, if the Senator will permit me just a moment, we received the estimate of the department of $5,653,000,000 and on that basis the bill as originally reported was framed. Then in 20 days, a little sooner than the Senator states, we were informed of the additional five billion and a half. We took up that question and we decided that it was impossible to take care of those new estimates until we knew what was to be appropriated. We had some idea of what the appropriations would be, but all we could do then, we decided, was to cover what had been appropriated. That raised the bill to $2,000,000,000. Then came out later the statement of the House which the Senator undoubtedly saw, by which it appeared that they intended to introduce the bond bill, which they now have, and not bring in any additional revenue bill at this session. Therefore the only opportunity to increase the tax at all was the opportunity which we have taken to raise in round numbers $500,000,000. The Senator is quite right about our having all that knowledge, of course.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The appropriations to which the Senator refers have not been made.

Mr. LODGE. We know what they are, or will know.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We knew that just as well before the bill came in.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but we did not know as early as the 27th of July.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As a matter of course, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is dated the 27th of July, and my recollection is, as the Senator suggests, that until probably a month before that we knew that we were going to have to meet these tremendous sums.

Mr. LODGE. We had the information from the Secretary of the Treasury on the 23d of July that five and a half billion more would be required.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was four days before the 27th?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it may also be stated, for additional information that the committee had, that the committee seriously considered taking these estimates into account, and went to the extent of summoning before the committee the heads of the different bureaus of the War Department and taking their testimony as to how much of the $5,000,000,000 would be absolutely required to be expended within the fiscal year, and, under the most rigid sifting and cross-examination, it was not possible to reduce by any appreciable amount the more than $5,000,000,000 of additional estimates as the sum which would be absolutely expended during the present fiscal year. After having gone into all that trouble to ascertain that fact, the committee backed away from that proposition and returned to the estimates that had been earlier made, and framed the bill upon that basis for its final report on the 6th of August.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the record on the back of this bill shows that it was reported to the Senate on July 3 with amendments. That is one day after these estimates upon which the committee claims to have based the bill came down, July 2. Then the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Finance July 7, or four days afterwards, and the Record shows clearly why that was done. Then these estimates came down July 27. The Senator from Massachusetts says they knew about this on July 23. Then the bill, after being kept in committee for two weeks, was reported August 6 with amendments. All the knowledge that we now have the committee had before this bill was reported. Everyone knows and no one better than the Senator from Massachusetts that Congress will provide for any estimate submitted for carrying on this war.

Oh, Mr. President, there is no one in the Senate who does not understand the situation. We all know why this amendment was brought in increasing the excess-war-profits taxes, as they claim, $400,000,000 and enlarging the scope of the provision to take in other than war profits. We do it without question and without investigation. If anyone dares to question the wisdom of an estimate he is hailed before the public as disloyal. That amendment and that system was brought in to prevent the Senate from adopting higher war excess-profits rates. That is why it was brought in. I am glad of this increase, though it is not as much as I would like. I am glad that those of us who have been trying to get higher rates in this bill were able to influence the Finance Committee to bring in a provision that would raise more money. I am willing to say that we had nothing to do with it so far as that is concerned. I am willing to say that they brought it in because they thought it ought to be brought in. I am willing to say that they brought it in because they thought after more careful deliberation over these excess estimates that they ought to raise at least $500,000,000 of the $5,000,000,000 additional by taxation, although as a matter of fact I know that they brought it in under the pressure of the sentiment in the Senate, and that through this plan alone has the Senate been led to defeat a larger appropriation of the war excess profits.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything about these matters, but it is well enough to have these facts brought in. While we are on this question about the accuracy of all these things I wish to refer to a matter that I intended to refer to yesterday, but I was not able to get recognition to do it. It illustrates to some extent the way this bill has been discussed. Day before yesterday afternoon the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] offered an amendment levying a flat 50 per cent rate. The learned and able Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who knows all about these things and about the statistics, and so forth, at once arose and declared emphatically that the 50 per cent flat rate proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire would not raise as much from the large corporations as the 60 per cent bracket proposed by the committee. Now, this is what he said. It attracted my attention. He said:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in explanation of this amendment. All day yesterday we were told that the Bethlehem Steel Co., the United States Steel Co., and the Du Pont Powder Co. should be forced to pay a greater percentage of excess war profits than the committee substitute provided for.

Mr. President, this amendment means that all three of these companies will pay but 50 per cent of their excess war profits instead of a graduated tax from 12 per cent to 60 per cent, as the committee substitute provides. All that these companies and companies like them are relieved of by the decrease from the average rate of the committee substitute to 50 per cent will fall upon the small corporations, who make from 15 per cent increase profits up.

He went further than saying that these companies would be relieved of their burden, and he charged that the effect of this amendment would be to place what they are relieved from upon the smaller companies. I have not any doubt that that had great weight with Senators who were here. Many of us accept the statement of the Senator from Utah upon matters of that kind without question. We regard his statements as absolute verity. I think they generally are correct, too. There is no man on this floor that has the general or detailed information that the Senator from Utah has. Yet it struck me as strange when I heard that, and I said:

I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. I understand the Senator contends that 50 per cent proposed by the Senator from

New Hampshire would make the companies that pay 50 per cent under the Senate committee bill pay less than the Senate committee amendment. That is the Senator's contention?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think the average is a little less.

Then I expressed some doubt with reference to that, but my expression of a doubt, of course, as against the infallibility of the Senator from Utah with reference to figures and statistics would not go very far with the Senate. So when we met yesterday I thought that we would probably get some information that might have weight with the Senate, and I requested that the expert be asked to determine just what the percentage would be under this 60 per cent bracket, and the chairman of the committee kindly asked the expert to do it. He furnished it and it is printed in the RECORD. It shows that the average rate under the committee plan with the 60 per cent bracket would be 46.9 per cent instead of over 50 per cent. In other words, the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire did take more from these companies than the amendment of the committee, and it did not relieve these companies and put additional burdens upon the smaller companies.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator contend that the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire did not place additional burdens upon the smaller companies?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I remember it, some of the lower brackets of the bill as now printed assessed a profits tax of 12 per cent and 20 per cent and 25 per cent. Perhaps I have the gradations wrong and inaccurate. But the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire would take 50 per cent from every concern, great or small. So would not that increase the burden on the small concerns?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not contended anything to the contrary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will pardon me, he has just said that the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire did not increase the burden upon the small concerns.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President; the Senator misunderstood me if he understood me to say anything of that kind. I said that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire did not relieve the large companies and place what they were relieved from upon the small companies. That is what I said, at least that is what I meant to say, because that was all I was talking about, and that is what I was refuting with reference to the statement of the Senator from Utah. I was not discussing the merits of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I was simply showing where the Senator from Utah was wrong, and that it did not impose a less burden upon these large companies and transfer some of their burden to smaller companies. I think the context will show clearly what I meant.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator showed a little too much, if he will pardon me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I did not. I simply showed that the Senator from Utah was wrong and that what he said would not happen. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire did impose greater burdens on small companies, but it did not place less upon these larger companies or transfer any of their burdens to the small companies, as charged by the Senator from Utah. I know the Senator from Utah made the statement in the utmost good faith. I know that statements made in discussing this bill are made in the utmost good faith, a great deal like the statement of the Senator from Utah with reference to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I am not criticizing anybody. I am simply calling attention to some facts here that I think it will be very interesting to know hereafter, when we come to consider the record with reference to this legislation and the arguments that have been made and the positions taken to sustain it.

Mr. President, I expected to be through before this time, but I will resume. There is another suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. It is immaterial, it does not amount to much, but I want to refer to it. I thought I had the RECORD right here marked, but I have not. However, the Senator from North Carolina said that the majority of this committee were Senators of long membership in this body, Senators who have frequently been returned here by their constituents, and therefore great weight should be given to their conclusions.

I know that we ought to give great weight to the conclusions of Senators who have been in this body for many years. I know that experience and training that comes with long service are invaluable and should be given great weight and are entitled to much consideration. I wish to say that the Senator from North Carolina has paid a very high compliment to the minority members of the Finance Committee. I simply want to put into the RECORD the facts with reference to the service of the able Senators of the majority of the committee, and when I do that it is not in any disparaging sense at all.

The Senator from North Carolina seems to think the fact that Senators have been long Members of this body and often elected here should give their opinions much weight. True enough. These are the facts as to the majority Members: The Senator from North Carolina has been a Member of this body for 16 years. The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has been a Member of this body for 14 years. The able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has been a Member of this body for six years. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has been an able Member of this body for six years. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], a leader of his party and a very learned Senator, has been here for four years. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and there is no abler Senator on the floor, no more industrious Senator on the floor, has been here for four years. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], a most able man, a man who served with great distinction as Assistant Secretary of the Interior, a man who has commanded the respect of every Member on this floor since his entrance into this body, a member of the Finance Committee, has been a Member of this body for six months. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], now presiding over this body, a gentleman whom we all respect and love, of splendid ability, of great business capacity, has been a Member of this body for six months. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], a gentleman whom we all respect, and honor and admire, a man of great ability, has been a Member of this body for six years, and he disagrees with his majority. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], brilliant, able, powerful in debate, has been a Member of the Senate for 10 years, and he disagrees with his colleagues of the majority.

Mr. President, I put that in the RECORD for what it is worth in connection with the statement of the Senator from North Carolina in support of his bill that length of service ought to command the confidence of the Senate, as it does.

Now, Mr. President, there is another suggestion I want to make. It has been stated by some of the Senators time and again that they "want to win the war." One great Senator weekly, if not daily, gets upon this floor and apparently lectures us when we do not happen to agree with him or support some measure that he is supporting, and he says, "I want to win the war." "I want to win the war." "I want to win the war." And so do I; and if the Senator repeats it once I repeat it a dozen times, if that is necessary.

Ah, Mr. President, we all want to win the war, and the suggestion or intimation upon the floor or anywhere else that there is any Senator here who does not want to win the war is more unpatriotic than any other suggestions made. In my judgment there is more harm being done to-day in this country by suggestions of that character upon this floor and by baseless, untruthful statements in the public press charging men with being unpatriotic simply because they do not happen to agree with the opinion or judgment of somebody else as to what is wise and what is best to do in this great crisis than by anything else.

Oh, Mr. President, instead of trying to make it appear that there are some of our citizens who are acting unpatriotically, we ought to show to the world that, although we may have our differences of opinion, there is no difference in our loyalty; no difference in our patriotism; no difference in our devotion to our country and to our country's cause. I do not believe that any Senator makes such suggestions as that on the floor really intending them as he makes them; but we ought to be very careful not to make such suggestions; not to give any cause or any ground for anyone outside to conclude that this representative or that representative is disloyal because he happens to favor a proposition a little bit different from that advocated by the majority. We ought to let the world know that whatever our differences of opinion may be, whatever our differences of judgment may be, we are all striving for the same end—a glorious termination of this war, with a lasting, permanent peace, with American rights and American privileges recognized everywhere and by every nation beneath the shining sun.

Mr. President, the majority of the committee say we must have credit. So we must. Every one of us believes in upholding and making strong the credit of the United States. How do they propose to maintain the credit of this country? By issuing bonds instead of paying cash; by allowing vast profits to be turned into bonds instead of into the Treasury of the United States to pay the obligations of our country, to supply our Armies and our Navy with arms and munitions and those things that are necessary to win battles; by making debts instead of paying cash; by making the people feel that we hold wealth more sacred than we do life. We do not intend to make them feel that way, but, Mr. President, we are doing it. We are making the people feel that way, whether we intend to do so or not. We ought to strive in every way possible to eradicate an opinion or belief of that kind. The majority would maintain our credit by dividing our people instead of unifying them; they would sustain our credit by permitting those who coin profits from war out of the blood and suffering of the boys at the front and the heart throbs of the loved ones at home to escape bearing the great burden of taxation; and they plan to fasten upon the boys who fight at the front the financial burdens of this Government when they come home. Mr. President, it is probable that we can not pay cash fully as we go, but, in my judgment, we ought to do it as nearly as we can without destroying our industries and destroying our business.

Mr. President, I marched in the parade on Tuesday, and then I stood by the side of the street and watched the marchers go by. I saw the boys upon whom the strong arm of the Government has been laid; I saw the boys that have been taken from their homes, taken from their business, taken from the opportunities of life, and compelled, if you please, to go into camp and to train to fight the battles of their country. As I saw them march by, in the vigor and the strength of their manhood, I asked myself, "Am I going back to the United States Senate and vote to place upon these boys, or such of them as may come home from the battle fields of Europe, the financial burdens of this Government in view of the sacrifices they will have already borne?" And I said, in my heart of hearts, "So far as I am concerned, I shall go as far as it is possible for me to go to make them feel that while they are fighting at the front I am not placing a burden financially upon them to bear when they come home." I am going to do it. If that is unpatriotic, make the most of it. I do not question the loyalty of those who disagree with me. We simply differ as to the wise and just course to follow.

Mr. President, it has been stated time and again in this debate that we want to permit individuals and corporations to save their profits; for what purpose? To buy bonds. Time and again has that been stated. Is it possible that that is the purpose of permitting these companies to keep the millions and the millions that they are securing from what the committee in its final report termed "war profits"? Surely not. It is said if we take this money for taxes we shall prevent expansion. Well, Mr. President, it has occurred to me that if we take the money to buy bonds we shall also prevent expansion. When you take the money for taxes it goes into the Treasury. When you take it in purchase of a Government bond it goes into the Treasury and not to expanding plants. Oh, but our friends meet that how? They say that when a man buys a bond he can take the bond and get cash for it and go on with his business. I presume that is true; but, Mr. President, what sort of a sacrifice does a man make in buying the bonds of the Government if he can do that? There is no sacrifice in that; not a bit.

Mr. President, I am going to make a personal allusion, not because I am better than anybody else but I think I express the sentiment not only of Senators but I believe I express the sentiment of the people of this country. I had rather take the money that I have paid for liberty bonds and put it into the Treasury of the United States, to be used by it in the discharge of its obligations; I had rather that you would say by law, just as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] stated yesterday afternoon—and he expressed the patriotic sentiments not only of a Senator but of the people of this country—"take by an income tax a greater percentage of my income; take all that I feel that I could pay for bonds and put it as a tax into the Treasury of the United States." I do not feel, Mr. President, that I have made any sacrifice in the purchase of the liberty bonds which I have bought. As has been suggested, I can probably take those bonds to bank any day that I want to do so and get every dollar that I paid for them, and use that money for 40 long years for my profit and for my advantage. What sacrifice have I made for my country? None at all.

of this country and the well-to-do of this country are patriotic. They are willing to do their part; they are willing to make real, genuine sacrifices in behalf of the country; and, in my judgment, they resent the intimation and the suggestion and the statement, in effect, on this floor that they are not patriotic; that they are not willing to deprive themselves of real comforts; that they are not willing to save and economize in order to give more financial aid to the Government.

Mr. President, one of the leading manufacturers of Seattle came down here a short time ago and expressed to me his views regarding this matter, and, in my judgment, he expressed the views of the great mass of our people. He said to me, "Senator, all that I ask of you is this: Let me have my capital; leave it so that I can use it; let me have of the profits from that capital enough to pay labor good, steady wages and to pay the expenses of my business and keep it going. Then ascertain what my net profits are and take every dollar of them that you want or that you think the country needs. I shall not starve; I shall not suffer. I make a hundred thousand dollars, and if you take $75,000, if you take $90,000 of it, I shall not suffer from cold; I shall not suffer from hunger; I shall not be making any real sacrifice." And he said, "Take it; take all you need of it. I will get along."

Another gentleman from Seattle called me into the Marble Room day before yesterday and showed me, with considerable pride, a receipt for $30,000 income tax paid. He said, "Senator, make it bigger. I am proud of that receipt. I shall be proud if the Government takes more. Take all of my income that you feel you need. It was no sacrifice to me to pay $30,000 in taxes; it will be no sacrifice to pay many thousands more. I want to do something for my country; I want to feel that I am doing something; I want to feel that I am making some real sacrifice; I want to feel that I am getting down on the plane of the boys at the front who are losing all opportunity, wealth, position, and, possibly, life itself. That is what I want to do; that is the position I hope you will put me in, along with the other wealthy men of the country; I can't serve in the trenches, but I want to serve with my means." Ah, Mr. President, that is the spirit of the people of this country, regardless of their position, regardless of their wealth, regardless of their influence or station in life.

But our friends say, "Oh, let posterity bear some of the burden of this war." Mr. President, we must bear the burden of this war; the men of the present will fight its battles and the money of the present must pay its debts and obligations. It is impossible to get around that. We may double the burden in order that posterity may have something to bear; but I want to say to you, Mr. President, that every cannon bought and every gun manufactured must be paid for now; every flying machine must be paid for now; every submarine must be paid for now by our money, the money of the people of the present day and not of the people of the years hereafter.

Why, Mr. President, the money that is raised by bonds is the money of the present and not of posterity. While it is, perhaps, as I have said, not possible to raise all the money necessary without selling bonds, let us not forget that the money that is necessary to prosecute the war must be raised now. As expressing my views, let me insert right here a couple of extracts from a late and well-considered article by Prof. Durand, of the University of Minnesota:

The most basic fact which must be borne in mind in discussing this problem is that, for the people considered as a whole, domestic borrowing postpones no burden to the future. This really follows at once from the fact that only goods produced before or during the war, or men living during the war, can be used in conducting the conflict. We can not shoot a shell to be made in 1930. The future is not here to bear burdens. Of course, borrowing abroad does make it possible to postpone the burden of the home country.

Borrowing at home, so far as a nation as a whole is concerned, is precisely similar to borrowing by an individual from himself. The reason the individual may gain by borrowing is because he borrows from another person. Would John Smith gain anything by writing a note to this effect: "Fifty years from date I and my heirs promise to pay to myself and my heirs $1,000 with interest at 6 per cent"? So far as the Nation as a Nation is concerned, a Government bond issued at home is precisely similar to such a note in its effect.

This idea that the burden of war expenditures can be deferred to future generations is the supreme fallacy of finance. Many a business man, whom we have every reason to consider sincere, insists that he is willing to bear his full and just share of the war burdens, but adds that he can see no fairness in making the present generation bear the entire cost of the war when the future generations are equally to profit by it. The future generations will, to be sure, have their burden from this war. They will have, in all probability, a somewhat depleted heritage of capital. They will presumably have to pay billions in pensions. But the future generations can not repay to the present generation its outlay in the conduct of the war.

Conceive, for example, that the present generation should wholly pass away in 40 years. If war bonds still remained unpaid the next generation would have to bear taxes to pay interest and principal. But it would be paying to itself; it would have inherited the bonds as well as the taxes. What it paid would not be a burden on the people of that generation as such. It would not be repaying the present generation.

The fact that generations gradually merge into one another does not change in the slightest the logic of the matter.

The same argument which applies to the future generations applies as well to the future years of the present generation. Prof. Sellman, among others, is not disposed to favor long-term bonds, but urges short-time bonds in preference to taxes for a large part of the war expenditures. He says it would be easier for the people to pay for the war in 10 years than in 3, assuming that it is over in 3 years. As a matter of fact, for the people considered as a whole it would not be one whit easier. What the people as a whole receive as interest and principal repayment, that they must also pay. They defer no burden by the short-time bonds.

While domestic bond issues postpone no burdens to the future as such, they do make possible a readjustment of the war outlay as between individuals and classes in the community. The really fundamental questions involved in the issue of taxation versus borrowing as a means of war finance are questions of social justice in the distribution of burdens. The war must be paid for now, but there may be a reassessment of expenses among us afterwards. For instance, those who have paid more in the first place may be recouped by those who have paid less. We shall all have bought our chips, but we may still play to see who gets and who loses them.

If we could assure ourselves that the distribution of taxes after the war would be as just as the distribution of taxes during the war, there would be little choice between taxation and borrowing were it not for the fact that, by inflating prices bond issues cause injustice as between individuals and classes, a point which will be discussed later.

In substance, then, war financing by bond issues is likely, even apart from its effect on incomes through the inflation of prices, to result in an increased inequality in the distribution of wealth and income. This is not a necessary result, for the taxes for debt service might be so levied as to prevent it, as virtually to make each class pay interest on and repay the principal of its own loans to the Government. There would be little likelihood, however, that the taxes after the war would be made sufficiently progressive to bring this about. The great political power of the well-to-do classes would almost certainly enable them, if they sought to do so, to shift part of the burden on the poorer classes, and they would probably seek to do so. The patriotism which during the war itself might induce the rich willingly to pay taxes according to the full measure of their ability is bound to wane considerably when the war is over. There is little enthusiasm about paying for a dead horse.

The tax policy, then, is more likely than the bond policy to mean the ultimate payment of war burdens in the manner which is socially equitable.

We can even afford to risk injury to our industries when so much is at stake. Prof. Durand says:

It has been estimated by the National City Bank that approximately $5,000,000,000 of the annual income of the country is in normal times devoted to new investments. It is a familiar fact that many persons of large income invest annually from half to nine-tenths of their income. Much as we should prefer not to check our industrial progress, we must remember that the very fate of all our past investments—indeed, the fate of the Nation itself—is at stake in the war, and that, purely from the material standpoint, it is good economy to spend what is necessary to save them, even if we temporarily forego industrial expansion. It is probable, in fact, that the largest one source of funds for the conduct of the war will have to be found in the diversion of that surplus income which ordinarily goes into investment.

I am not going to discuss the philosophy or the effect of issuing bonds, and how the debt is passed on to posterity, or anything of that sort; I merely want to say that I have voted to take 80 per cent of the war profits; I have voted to take 70 per cent of the war profits; I have voted to take 60 per cent of the war profits, not to retard industry, not to punish wealth or capital, not out of enmity to capital, not to paralyze the Government or industry; but I so voted, Mr. President, to make the Nation strong, to unify our people, to work no injustice; I so voted to mobilize all of our industrial strength as well as our manhood.

Mr. President, as I have said, we are in war; men must be taken to fight our battles; money must be taken to pay our obligations and support the men at the front. I voted to conscript our manhood. Why? Because we needed men; because we wanted to make it sure and certain that we would have an army at the earliest possible moment. When I voted to conscript the manhood of the country I resolved at the same time to go as far as I could go in every way that I should deem wise to take the wealth of the country in order to maintain and support the war. I am not going to take money because I voted to take men—not at all—I voted to take men because we needed them, and I shall vote to take money because we need money. We must have men to fight battles, and so we took them. We must have money to support the Government, and so I am in favor of taking it. We can not expect men to come up and voluntarily deposit money in the Treasury of the United States. We did expect that men would come up and volunteer to go to the trenches; and some Senators on this floor very vigorously opposed the conscription of our men, because they thought they ought to be permitted to volunteer. I was strongly inclined to that view, but for many reasons, which I stated at the time, I voted to take our boys.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not rather a sore disappointment to him that Senators on this floor who were very eager to conscript the boys to go to the front and who joined with him in that conscription bill are now on the other side when it comes to conscripting wealth?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is, Mr. President; but I do not question their loyalty or their patriotism because of the position they take.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that they were honest and patriotic in their views at that time, and I think they are honest and patriotic now. They simply differ from me as to what is the wise course to take. I hope, however, that they will not point the finger of disloyalty at me because now, when it comes to taking money because we need it, I am willing to take it and am voting to take it and believe that wealth is not objecting to that course, but that it will be glad to contribute its fair share, just as the Senator from Georgia yesterday stated he would be glad to pay 25 per cent or more out of his income into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The speakers on the minority side of this question whom I have heard all talk as though the majority did not favor conscripting wealth. Does the Senator take the position that the majority does not favor conscripting wealth?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not; and I think I have tried to make it plain that I do not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought the Senator was emphasizing the fact that now the majority which was in favor of conscripting men was not in favor of conscripting money.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President; I am emphasizing my position; that is what I am doing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator, then, has come to the majority position that when something is needed it should be conscripted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, sir; that is exactly my position. There is a little difference of course; some of our friends do not seem to think we need so much as I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They do not think so when it comes to money as strongly as they did when it was a question of taking men.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Some think that we ought to pass our needs on to posterity and not take care of them ourselves. They may be right and I may be wrong, but we need money, and I say we ought to take it as fully and as nearly as possible in accordance with our needs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, has the Senator reflected that the title which was adopted yesterday by the Senate conscripts $4,000,000 a day upon the industries of the United States? Is not that considerable of a conscription of wealth?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have referred to that. I might just as well say right here—I had intended to speak of it a little further on, but I might just as well say in that connection—that according to the majority report the war profits—not excess profits, not profits of business generally, but what they term pure "war profits"—were over $3,000,000,000 last year, and the majority say that these war profits, these profits over normal profits, these profits that they think they trace back to the war will amount this year to over $3,000,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To over $4,000,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And it has been stated on this floor by majority Members that they will amount to over $4,000,000,000 for the year 1917. The Senator from Nebraska thinks, with demands upon this Government for $19,000,000,000 for this fiscal year, that it is enough to take $400,000,000 out of over $4,000,000,000 to pay our expenses and to meet our needs. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska may be right; and I do not say that he is not in favor of conscripting wealth and profits—he is; he is in favor of taking $400,000,000 out of over $4,000,000,000, while I am in favor of taking $3,000,000,000 out of $4,000,000,000. That is the only difference; I go a little further than he goes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator has not got his figures correct. According to the schedule which the Senate adopted yesterday on the recommendation of the committee the additional burden placed upon the industries of the country amounts to $1,400,000,000 a year, which is about $4,000,000 a day—a tax never before levied upon the industries of any country in the world, a tax not levied upon the industries of any country now at war in Europe, an unheard of tax, a conscription of wealth; and yet the Senator and his associates talk as though we were not conscripting wealth in this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President, I am not talking as though we were not conscripting wealth; we are conscripting wealth; but we are not conscripting it enough. I am not talking about the general profits of the country and I am not mistaken in my figures. The committee says that we have produced in this country, not in the general industries, not out of general profits, but over $4,000,000,000 of pure war profits. How much profit throughout the country derived from general industry is covered by the plan now I do not know; no doubt it is billions more, but of the pure war profits of over $4,000,000,000 the committee proposed as the bill was originally reported, to take $562,000,000.

Then the committee, under pressure and in response to the sentiment here, have devised a plan by which they cover not only war profits, but what may be termed "excess" profits, and through that means they have raised $400,000,000 more; but no man can tell how little of that comes out of the $4,000,000,000 war profits and no man can tell how much of it comes out of that amount.

Oh, Mr. President, to use just one illustration—and I do not take this company because I want to bring out any invidious comparison or anything of that sort, but simply because it illustrates what we are doing—it is said that the United States Steel Corporation will make this year $490,000,000 of war profits. I have no enmity against the steel company; I am glad they are making that enormous profit, if they have not unduly oppressed anybody in order to make it. I am conceding that they have used perfectly legitimate, just, and honorable means in making $490,000,000 of war profits; but how much do you propose to take under this bill? After leaving them their capital, after leaving them their plant, after leaving them what is necessary to run it, after leaving what is necessary to pay good wages and all their expenses, depreciation, and so on, we would then leave them 20 per cent additional to the normal profits. Under our proposal we would have taken how much? Eighty per cent of $490,000,000, which would be in the neighborhood of $350,000,000—perhaps a little more or a little less; I have not figured it out. That would leave them a profit of over $100,000,000 above the normal profit, above what is necessary to run their business as they are running it now. They would have next year all the facilities for making a profit that they have had this year to make $490,000,000. We would leave them $100,000,000 more to add to that, in addition to their normal profits.

What do they take under this bill? One hundred and eighty million, or $184,000,000, leaving to the company over $300,000,000 of war profits, in addition to the normal profits. Now, that may be right. I do not say that it is not, but I believe we ought to take more than that. I believe that the Steel Co. would welcome having us take more of it. I believe that they are patriotic men, just as the men from Seattle are patriotic, and they would not complain, they would not object, if we should take $350,000,000; no, they would not object if we should take $400,000,000 and leave them $90,000,000 in addition to their normal profits.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator happen to know what percentage of income on the invested capital $350,000,000 would represent to the Steel Corporation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, Mr. President, I do not, and I do not care.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is not that rather important to the 100,000 stockholders?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, it is not; when they get the normal profits and the normal dividends returned to them. They ought to make some sacrifices, and they are willing to make some sacrifices. Mr. President, a man or a woman who owns corporate stock in war times, who gets in dividends a greater percentage than he or she ever got in peace times, ought to be satisfied and willing to allow to go to his or her country, under which his or her holdings are protected, the remainder of whatever profit has come from war in order that their country, their flag, may be upheld and maintained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I agree with the general theory of the utterance just made by the Senator from Washington. In view of the fact that he was pointing to a specific corporation, and naming the amount which would be left to that corporation for distribution among its stockholders, I was merely endeavoring to find out if he could give us specific information as to what would be the actual effect of the proposed tax upon the stockholders.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am not worrying about that. What I am worrying about is carrying this war to a successful conclusion, bringing our people all together, making every person in it feel that he is a part of his Government; that he is a part of his country; that he is interested in the prosecution of the war, in the victory that we must have if we would preserve our rights and our civilization.

Mr. President, we have been told time and again, through the press and through official sources, that if Germany wins it is an end to our liberty; it is an end to our Government. Mr. President, is it possible that we will, here on the floor of the Senate, measure such possibilities by percentages? I do not think we ought to do it. I may be wrong, but I am patriotically of the opinion that I express.

Mr. President, I have been diverted again, but I just want to call attention to a table. I am not going to have it reinserted; but I want to call attention to it in the hope that it may get to the country even more than it has already. It is the table introduced by the chairman of this committee on page 5069 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. What does it show? This table, Mr. President, was prepared upon the basis of the bill as originally reported, not to meet the situation covered by the amendment now. It was prepared to show the war profits in the country, and it was prepared to show what it was proposed to take of those war profits. It gives 48 companies. What does it say? It says that the war profit of these 48 companies was $659,858,490. It says that these 48 companies have excess profits of over $659,000,000. How much does the committee propose to take of the war profits of these 48 companies? Two hundred and forty million fifty thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars.

Mr. President, that may be wise. I know that the committee is patriotic. I know that its members are honest and sincere. I know that they believe that that is all they ought to take. I do not think it is. I may be wrong. They may be right. But I want to say, Mr. President, that we should look a little bit further than this Senate Chamber. We should look a little bit further than dollars and cents. We should look a little bit further than percentages. The people of this country, when they see that we only propose to take $240,000,000 out of over $600,000,000 of the purely war profits of 48 companies, will not understand why we do not take more.

I do not threaten anybody; I do not believe in doing that; but these are the facts. We know what the people are thinking. We know what the people are saying. The people are watching us. They are anxious to know what we are going to do in these matters. They know about these great war profits.

Why, Mr. President, I have here a statement from the Pennsylvania Grange News of July, 1917. They give a table corresponding to the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. They know what these war profits are, and they are going to know what we are going to take out of them. What do they say here? As patriotic citizens—because that is what they are; that is the kind of people this paper represents—they say, as we are taking the men that we need, we should take the money that we need.

My good friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] yesterday made a suggestion that just comes to me. He suggested that we are following the same plan in this bill in conscripting money that we followed in conscripting men. "Why," he said, "we are taking it by gradations." He said: "We conscripted a million men instead of 10,000,000. Why," he said, "if we should come out to-morrow with the statement that we were going to take 10,000,000 of our men, it would create a panic." Well, it would. Then he said: "We are following the same plan in taking money."

Ah, Mr. President, when you conscripted a million men you did not conscript a million parts of a million men. You took all of every man you took. And so, if we were to follow the real plan that we followed in conscripting men, we would conscript every dollar of profits that every corporation makes, if not the corporation itself, and leave others with everything they have.

No, Mr. President, this is a different plan of conscription from the way we conscripted men. We said to every man we conscripted: "All of you, come." Now we propose to say to all of the companies of the country: "Give us a part of your profits." The only difference is as to how great a part; that is all.

Oh, I do not say the country has a wrong idea. If it has a wrong idea, it has pretty good authority for its belief. I have here a statement clipped from the Washington Post of the other day, and there have been a great many like this coming from official sources. Listen:

Vrooman attacks "profiteers."

Who is Vrooman? Why, he is Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. He is a man of authority. He is a man of responsibility. He is a man with knowledge. What does he say to the people of this country?

Charges that certain business men of the United States are robbing and practically undernourishing the people of the Nation and that they should be ashamed to call themselves American citizens were made by Carl Vrooman, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, in an address at the Emory School last night. Mr. Vrooman advocated cooperative buying to avoid high prices, and declared that the country is being bled white from coast to coast by the food grafters and "profiteers."

I do not vouch for that. The Senator from New York asks if I believe it. I know this, and the Senator from New York knows this—that Washington City is filled, and its hotels are crowded with men—representatives of companies—seeking contracts for Government supplies and Government needs, and it is in the air that they are getting bargains that are unconscionable. What I do believe is this, however: That the great mass of the business men of the country, the great mass of those who are called the capitalists of the country, are not doing what Mr. Vrooman says; that they are anxious and willing to help their Government; they are anxious and willing for us to put them all upon the same plane; and they will be willing to contribute of their means and even of their capital, if necessary, to furnish whatever is needed to defray the expenses of this Government.

Mr. President, we have had a whole lot of straw men put up in this Senate Chamber during this discussion. The chaff and straw of these men that have been knocked down and torn up has been scattered all over the Chamber, and one of those that has been put up is that we want to destroy business. We do not want to destroy business any more than the majority. We do not believe a business will be destroyed where all its capital is left unimpaired, where its normal profit is left to it, and where it is left, in addition, 20 per cent of its war profits. The men who run business will redouble their efforts; they will economize as never before; they will improve their methods, make their plants more efficient, and increase their business and profits and be far better prepared to enter the contest of wits and commercial rivalry when the war is over. They will not sulk; they will not close their plants; they will not forsake their Government; but they will make the most of necessity and show the enemy that this is not a people whose God is the dollar, and that they are not in this war for profit.

Another straw man is that we want to array class against class. We do not. I want to avoid that very thing. I do not believe in trying to stir up class against class. I do not believe that anyone on this floor wants to do it. We are not trying to take these profits because they belong to rich men. We are simply trying to take them because we need them, and we are going to get them where they are, just as we are taking our men because we need them, and we are going to get them where they are. That is all. That is the basis of it. In my judgment, our failure to take more of the profits of the war to defray its expenses will do more to create class feeling than anything we can say or do. I hope I am wrong.

Mr. President, I just want to call attention now to a few facts showing how the people are looking at our actions. I have here a statement from a very important paper of the city of New York. This is the Evening Mail of August 22, and it has an editorial in it headed "One million dollars per day." I ask leave to put that editorial in the Record without reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

$1,000,000 PER DAY.

The Senate Finance Committee reports that the war profits of the Steel Corporation for 1916 were $207,945,953. This sum represents not the total net income available for stockholders but merely the excess profits above those of the three years preceding the war earned by the corporation.

If the earnings of the Steel Corporation during 1917 were to be the same as during 1916, and if the Senate committee's proposed excess-profits tax were applied to these earnings, the result would be that the Government would take $77,000,000 of these excess profits and leave $131,000,000 of them for the Steel Corporation's stockholders. Remember this whole $208,000,000 was made by the war. It never existed before. If it is not taxed now, it can never be taxed, because there will be no war profits when the war is over.

Of course during this coming year the Steel Corporation will earn a far larger net than $208,000,000. The prospects are that it will earn in the neighborhood of $475,000,000 excess profits. Of this, under the proposed tax schedule, approximately $175,000,000 would go to the

It is a goodly sum, $300,000,000. It is $1,000,000 for every workday in the year. The United States Steel Corporation is to be allowed to earn and distribute $1,000,000 per day more than it was earning before the war. Its stockholders are to sit back and grow rich at the time when the manhood of the country is to offer the last full measure of sacrifice for America. At least, that is what the Senate Finance Committee proposes. The Congress which accepts such a proposal and enacts it into law will go down in history as a set of traitors to the people of the land.

This is the Congress which voted for 100 per cent conscription. Every man who qualified was to be taken, up to the limits of men desired. It was not 20 per cent or 60 per cent or 80 per cent of the man that was required; the whole man was taken; all of him was called upon. The evidence of corporate fitness for the Government's finance service is the possession of an excess income, the possession of war profits. In the name of justice shall we stop before we conscript these profits up to the limit of our financial need?

It is estimated that the excess profits for the year 1916 were approximately $3,000,000,000. Suppose—which is impossible—that excess profits for 1917 are only $3,000,000,000, how much does the Senate Finance Committee propose to conscript of these vast sums? It proposes to take $562,000,000, less than 20 per cent of the total. In what sort of a land do we live when our highest legislative body proposes to conscript 100 per cent of life and 20 per cent of war profits? Whom is the Senate representing when it brings in a tax bill with only $562,000,000 levied upon war profits and then turns to the poor man and taxes his tea, coffee, sugar, cocoa, postage stamps, passenger fares, and medicines?

Why, if we levied on excess profits the 80 per cent rate which is levied in Great Britain, we should take from the Steel Corporation alone $400,000,000 and leave it $100,000,000. Its stockholders would still receive for the year 1916 $100,000,000 more than they received in the three years previous to the war. One hundred million dollars is 20 per cent on the Steel Corporation's outstanding common stock. Is that not still a rich revenue to earn from war?

The Evening Mail believes in the corporation. It wants the corporation fostered, aided, purified of the corporate grossness and selfishness which now are the ailments of socialism. But the Evening Mail is also for the individual, the common man. You can not take all he has in the world, all the hopes of those that are dear to him; you can not take these things and throw them 100 per cent into the red line of battle, and then take only 20 per cent of the purely war wealth which the corporations are amassing. You can not ask the people to fight this war and then bear its financial burdens in the future, by assuming the payment of interest and principal on loans held by the rich slackers who had to be bribed to finance their country's need.

Watch your Senator and see whether he votes for the iniquitous bill which the majority of the Senate Finance Committee has brought in. See if he votes for letting the Steel Corporation retain $1,000,000 extra war profits for every working day of the year. See if he believes that you and I should be drafted for the coming service, but that the rich man should be bribed to do his share.

Better still, write your Senator before he registers his vote. If you are a New Yorker, your Senators are WADSWORTH and CALDER; if you live in New Jersey, your Senators are FRELINGHUYSEN and HUGHES; if you are in Connecticut, your Senators are BRANDEGER and MCLEAN. Those Senators are now going to stand up and be counted. Let them know that you are personally making up the count.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to call attention to one statement now, however, so that if anybody wants to cut it out he can do it. I do not believe it is true myself, but it simply shows how the suggestions and intimations on this floor lead to extravagant statements outside. After discussing the amount that we raise and that we ought to raise, it says:

At least that is what the Senate Finance Committee proposes. The Congress which accepts such a proposal and enacts it into law will go down in history as a set of traitors to the people of the land.

I do not think that is true; but, Mr. President, that is a mild statement compared with many of the statements made by other papers in the city of New York. They do not hesitate day after day to say that this Senator or that Senator is unpatriotic, that he is a traitor to his country. They have not as much ground for making those statements as this paper has for making that statement, and it has none.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if this editorial was published before the committee amendment was proposed or afterwards?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is dated August 22. I can not say offhand.

Mr. NORRIS. It was before.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was before, I think; and it was in view of the debate that was being had on the floor here in favor of taking 60, 70, or 80 per cent of these war profits.

Mr. President, I have here an editorial from a paper in the Northwest that shows somewhat what the sentiment is among the people of the country. Whether it is justified or not, it is the sentiment of many, and in my judgment this Senate can do no more for its country in any way than by using all reasonable means to refute these statements by action that will show that they have no basis. This editorial says:

WHY DO WORKINGMEN JOIN THE I. W. W.?

The Pacific Northwest is to-day up in arms against the I. W. W. It has been repeatedly pointed out by this paper that there is a wide divergence of opinion as to the ideas and principles of the I. W. W.

While they are regarded as criminals and anarchists by certain people, others maintain that they are an extremely radical but perfectly legitimate labor organization. This paper holds no brief for radicalism; however it must be said in all fairness that it is not surprising to see radicalism thrive under present conditions; it would be surprising, indeed, if it did not thrive.

A careful and dispassionate survey of the facts, cold, cruel, undeniable, and generally known facts will plainly show why radicalism is sweeping the country, why we have I. W. W., and why trouble is brewing everywhere. Following is a list of the war profits that have been pocketed by a number of corporations in recent years: American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., 1,500 per cent; Du Pont Powder Co., 1,400 per cent; Bethlehem Steel Co., 1,300 per cent; Anaconda Copper Co., 400 per cent; Armour & Co., 350 per cent; United States Steel Corporation, 350 per cent; American Beet Sugar Co., 250 per cent; American Hide & Leather Co., 250 per cent.

Mr. President, my recollection, from the figures given in the minority and the majority reports, is that these figures are about right. The people have the facts. Take them altogether and they are as familiar with them as any Senator on this floor.

This list is, of course, incomplete and could be continued ad libitum. A profit of 100 per cent is regarded as enormous in normal times, but the reports of a good many corporations show that their profits have been many times larger.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, from what paper is the Senator reading?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know. In clipping it the name was clipped off of it; but I know it is a paper from my State. It came from out there. I do not know what the paper is. The profits of Armour & Co. are given here as 350 per cent. That may be wrong; I do not know; but I know that many of these figures are just about right, according to the facts.

Mr. BRADY. Regardless of the paper, they are good facts.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. The name of the paper would not add to or take from them.

Now, let us look at the reverse side of the picture. Wages have gone up considerably, but the average raise in wages since the outbreak of the war is only 18 per cent, while the prices of necessities of life have gone up 85 per cent. It may be said that those profits are abnormal and will be reduced considerably as soon as the war is over. It may also be said that the present prices are abnormal and will not last. But these considerations afford scant comfort to the people with small incomes, and they constitute just about 90 per cent of our population.

The workmen are well informed about the condition; they know that a number of corporations have been permitted to make profits that are out of all proportion; they read it in their papers and they naturally believe that they do not receive their proper share out of this golden blessing. Moreover, owing to the greatly reduced buying power of money the remuneration for their work is considerably smaller than in normal times. All this is perfectly clear, and it is bound to make malcontents and revolutionaries out of people who are otherwise conservative and not in the least radically inclined. So far the Government has failed to investigate the I. W. W. movement, but if it ever does it will probably find that the overwhelming majority of the members are not ardent supporters of the cause and perhaps do not even approve of the principles and methods of the organization. They have simply joined the I. W. W. to voice their protest against existing conditions, and in order to do so they joined the most radical organization they could find. No, indeed; it is not surprising that we have I. W. W., and they surely have come to stay unless economic conditions in this country are radically changed.

Mr. President, I am not vouching for the facts set out here. I am simply presenting this to show to the Senate, to emphasize what no doubt Senators know, how the people of the country are looking at this situation. They are not splitting hairs over percentages. They are not interested in the minute figures presented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. They are interested in life, in happiness, in prosperity, in comfort, in fair treatment by their Government, in the success of their Nation in this war, and in an early peace.

I will insert here another article, without reading—an editorial from one of the influential papers of Seattle, which reflects the views of many of our plain people. Its language, I grant you, is extravagant, but many of our people are thinking these things. It is worth much to show them in this hour of trial that there is no basis for their belief.

[From the Seattle Star.]

SOAKING THE PLAIN PEOPLE.

Soak the plain people! It's the good old game of Congress, and it's in full swing right now.

While the plain people are at the height of patriotic fervor, registering for their country's service, registering to give their lives, if need and chance so will, Congress whangs them over the head with an unequal, unjust tax bludgeon.

The war-revenue bill as it stands, almost ready for passage, puts the burden on the poor.

There is little sign of conscription of wealth in this bill.

Such things as enormous incomes seem to have escaped the notice of the merry gentlemen.

No increase in inheritance taxes is provided.

Jewelry is overlooked.

But they got right after the little incomes—taxing them down as low as $2,000 for married men and $1,000 for single men. Millions are to be raised by stamp taxes on things that we must have to live, but the rich users of those things will pay no more than the poor users of the same things.

This must not be. There must be no such abuses as this while America's people stand ready for the supreme sacrifice in the interest of democracy.

If the plain people are to give their lives, the rich must give their cash, whether they are willing or not.

Congress has got to understand that.

Stiff inheritance taxes; good, strong taxes on incomes under $100,000 and 100 per cent taxation on incomes over that; and a proper percentage of all war profits—that is asking less than enough.

Compared to the tax that the poor must pay, even under the lightest levy, that would be letting the rich down easy.

Congress knows this, yet Congress goes blindly ahead, winking at great wealth and digging into the wages of the poor for all in sight.

This is not the way to fight a great war. All the people must pay their share. The poor are doomed to pay theirs. The rich must pay theirs also if this country is to be successful.

There's not a dollar of all the wealth in the country that has not been made by labor expended. It can all be replaced by more labor. And there's not a life that when once destroyed is not gone forever.

Because this is so we will not have wealth sneaking to protection behind the backs of bonehead Congressmen; we will not have wealth finding safety in the cloak rooms of Congressmen who have got so far away from the real people that they can no longer hear the wants of the people.

It is time that the dodo birds in Washington quit hatching conspiracies against the plain people.

Wealth must come out and fight as well as the poor. Democracy must rule in all things.

Mr. President, I have here a statement from a very responsible source, from a man for whom I have a great deal of admiration, although I do not agree with him in all things. I differ with him very radically sometimes; but he is a man of very great power, very great influence, and a man who, in my judgment, has as much individual power and control over men in this country as almost any other man in it. I have here a statement from Samuel Gompers, published in the Washington Post of the other morning.

Gompers urges peace-time profits and tax upon war's necessities—Labor head declares such a step would unify Nation behind Government's efforts—Opposes mortgaging future to pay for conflict.

Those are the headlines. Now, this is the article:

[By Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor.]

There never was a war that afforded less justification for war profits than that in which our country is now engaged. The fundamental purpose of this war is to establish inviolability of human rights. In my opinion the rate of taxation upon war profits should be brought down to nearly peace profits.

For this war our Republic has felt justified in enforcing compulsory military service at the constant hazard of health, body, and life; to require the full man power in production and transportation.

That corporations, companies, and even individuals should have the opportunity to coin the flesh and blood of their countrymen into war profits is abhorrent to justice and humanity and in conflict with the very ideals for which our people and their allies are contending.

I want you to listen to this, Senators. It expresses my view, whether it does yours or not. It expresses my opinion as to what would result from the action that I think we ought to take, and it states the dangers of the action, in my judgment, that I am afraid the Senate will take:

WOULD WIPE OUT PROFITS.

No single determination would do more to unify the Nation behind the Government's efforts in this war and to establish a feeling of equity and security than to tax war profits that would virtually wipe out of existence profits resulting from the war.

It has long been charged that there are industries and financial interests which have even endeavored to provoke war, that they might profit thereby.

Mr. President, I do not believe that charge. I do not think there are financial interests in this country that desired to provoke this war; but I know that there are many people in this country who honestly think so, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not want, and I know that no other Senator on this floor wants, to lend color or basis to that contention.

Even now, despite the fact that America has joined in this world struggle for most exalted, fundamental principles and ideals, the false charge has been leveled against us that this is a war for profits.

By preventing profits from our present war's necessities, nothing would tend so much to enroll the spirit, conscience, and activity of our people in one great homogeneous task to win the war for justice, freedom, and democracy the world over.

ADVISES PEACE-PROFIT LEVEL.

In recognition of the unusual conditions attending war production, in my opinion the rate of taxation upon war profits should be brought down to nearly normal peace profits, and surely the history of industry of the United States demonstrates the fact that those profits are not niggardly to enterprise and wealth.

It is my judgment that it would be extremely unwise for our Government to raise all the revenue of this war for democracy and humanity through borrowing and mortgaging the future. Under the borrowing principle safe loans are made to the Government, for which full compensation is guaranteed.

Interest on loans, and often loans themselves, must be repaid by taxation levied upon the people and which, of course, fall more heavily upon the poor than upon the wealthy.

By taxation on war profits, incomes, and inheritance, our country can in a large part meet the expenses of the war as we proceed with that great enterprise.

Mr. President, as I have already said, it has been intimated that some of us who have been in favor of raising higher taxes than some think we ought to raise are disloyal and unpatriotic.

The papers of this morning all quote the speech of a man whom no one will charge with being unpatriotic or disloyal in the slightest degree. This man has a greater political following in this country than any other single man. He represents strong, earnest, virile Americanism to the American people as no other American. He is the very embodiment of the soul of patriotism. Theodore Roosevelt is quoted as saying that Congress should take excess war profits now up "to the limit of England." Will anyone charge him with disloyalty or with endeavoring to make the war unpopular? The Senator from Utah said we are above England. He has said that many times. From that percentage proposition of yesterday I am afraid the Senator may be mistaken. I know he is not intentionally mistaken. He thinks that he is right. There are too many different elements in the situation for any man to try to determine the action of the two countries in percentages, but as I have said time and again, Mr. President, I am not measuring this by percentages. We are a greater country than England ever was or ever will be. We can and ought to do what England never has done and never can do in the way of raising money and financing war. We may learn something from England's experience, but because she has done or not done this or that is no conclusive determination for our action. When we were conscripting men we did not follow her course. We did not delay because she had delayed. Nor should we delay in taking war profits because she delayed. My friend from Utah cites Canada as not taking much of wealth. Neither did she conscript men, but we did not follow her example in that. Neither should her fiscal action determine ours.

Mr. President, it has been suggested on this floor time and again that we are raising more money by this bill than any nation on earth has ever raised by a taxation bill before. That does not appeal to me. There has never been a nation from the dawn of time that has been confronted by such an annual budget as this Nation is confronted with now. Twenty-five billions spent and obligated by England in three years! According to the Senator from Utah, this Nation will be obligated to from nineteen to twenty-one billion the first year of the war, and his figures are likely too low.

Mr. President, the very necessities of the time, the very conditions that confront us, make this a period unlike anything in the world's history, and make it necessary for us to do and take differently from what any nation has ever been called to do and take in the past.

Two billion five hundred million dollars by this bill! Yet the needs of the Nation are $19,000,000,000! Mr. President, if we were to raise $4,000,000,000 of taxes by this bill there would be billions upon billions for the men who may want to buy bonds, for the men who may want to invest their money without making any sacrifice, to pass on to posterity in a double burden, to overturn our fiscal policies and bring panic and disaster to our industries and people when peace comes and brings a further concentration of wealth in the hands and under the control of the few.

I say, Mr. President, that in my judgment it is our duty to take of these profits while they are here. Nobody is trying to fool the people here; but do not think that the people will accept the argument that we should leave these profits now for a future tax bill. That tax bill may come when the profits of 1917 have gone the way of the profits of 1916. It will doubtless do so unless we take them by this bill.

Why is it that the committee have stricken out some of the provisions of the House bill relating to collecting from the profits and income of 1916? Why is it that they have refused to accede to the proposition that would reach back into 1916? They have not accepted that because they did not think that was fair and right and just. The men who have made those profits have distributed and have used them in their business. I agree with the wisdom of the committee in that, but I do not want to be confronted by a proposition of that kind with reference to the 1917 profits when the next tax bill comes here, as it will come next winter. I do not want to have it said then we can not tax this $3,000,000,000 of profits because they have been distributed, and it would be retroactive, unjust, and unfair.

Mr. President, the people know that if those profits are not taken to defray the expenses of the Government now they never will be taken. We will have another tax bill; it will come in before long; it will be here at the next session, and we shall have to raise a lot of money. The profits will have gone. We will have to take a greater percentage then of the profits of 1918 than we would have to take if we would take more out of the profits that we know we have.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis] said we are likely to have peace in two months. If that is so, then the war profits would not come next year, and these profits will be gone, and the burden upon business will be greater and more oppressive in time of peace than it ought to be.

The majority say, "We will have another bill next winter; wait for that. We will have to tax then." We know we will have to do it. We know about what we will have to raise. Why not do it now? Why keep business unsettled? Let it know as soon as possible what it has to meet. It can then get active and do its work. You can not "manana" successfully in war.

Senators talk about England. I have a statement here from the chief justice of England. His advice ought to be good to our friends of the majority. This is in the Washington Post of August 26. I like to take articles out of that paper, because the majority seem to put a great deal of reliance in it:

England sets example for America in drastic conscription of wealth—sound finance requires cost of war be met and burden not left for posterity, says Lord Chief Justice Reading.

Without reading this article, I ask that it may be put in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

LONDON, August 25, 1917.

"Don't leave the burden of the war to posterity," was the advice to America to-day of Lord Chief Justice Reading in an interview.

England is now conscripting wealth to a degree not approached by any other nation, and still further increased taxes on incomes must soon be made.

Government figures to-day showed that revenues of the current year are estimated on a basis of $2,000,000,000 from incomes and excess-profits tax, against less than $700,000,000 from customs, excise, estate, stamp, and all other miscellaneous taxes combined.

"The point has arrived when little measures will not suffice," the chief justice said. "Sweeping action is necessary. It is not a question of raising $5,000,000 here and $10,000,000 there, it is a question of raising billions."

In view of the debate now in progress in the American Senate over conscription of wealth and taxation for the war, Lord Reading was asked to outline for the American people how England is meeting the problem.

"Sound finance," he declared, "required that we pay for the war as far as possible out of war-time taxation. Britain, recognizing this, is now unprecedentedly conscripting wealth. And very soon she must greatly increase taxes on incomes."

"While the income tax has been increased from a shilling and three pence on a pound (approximately 31 cents out of $4.87) and in many cases of the largest incomes through a supertax to 8s. 6d. ($2.12), the limit has by no means been reached. (The rate specified here is slightly less than 50 per cent.)

WISDOM OF METHOD PROVED.

"England has proved the wisdom of this method I have outlined. She is able to face an extension of that principle as far as necessary and possible."

"The history of the United States, like that of England, has shown the fallacy of attempting to leave the burden of the war for posterity to pay. Germany on the other hand, practically disregarding a fair and democratic method, is raising only an infinitesimal part of her war expenses from incomes and war profits. In the future Germany will also suffer the consequences of this policy. Unfortunately, it is true, France and Russia are also pursuing it, but there is reason to believe that the United States plans to adopt the wiser and safer course."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have taken much more time than I intended. I have referred to many more matters than I intended to refer to. These were brought out by interruptions.

I want to say, Mr. President, and when I say it I do not reflect upon the motives of anyone else, my sole purpose is to prosecute this war with the utmost vigor and power and energy, to prosecute it with all the resources of men and money that are necessary to bring it to a successful conclusion. I think we ought to act upon the theory that this is going to be a long war, and we ought to prepare for it on that basis. By doing so we are more apt to bring it to a successful conclusion within the time indicated by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, we need men. We have taken them. We need money. Let us take it. We need to show to the people of this country that the Senate of the United States recognizes the sentiment throughout the country; that it proposes in levying taxes not only to encourage business but to encourage the efficiency of business; that it proposes to show to the people of the country that the Nation is theirs, that the fight is theirs, that they are going to be treated fairly and justly; and that every man and woman is expected to bear his or her burden and make his or her sacrifices in behalf of liberty and the preservation of our country, its rights, its institutions, and its proper place among the nations of the earth.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand it is not the purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin or perhaps of the Senator from North Carolina to press this amendment to a vote this evening, so that I can defer any remarks I wish to make.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator is ready to speak this afternoon, I think this will be a very good time to make his speech.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is quite immaterial to me when I speak.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a good time. We shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I fear I shall seem to those Senators who have listened to this debate to be somewhat unorthodox in that I shall not refer in any extended manner to some of the claims for credit that have been made upon the floor. It strikes me that we should endeavor to direct our attention to what the Senate is doing rather than to determine which Senator is doing it.

I have the greatest respect for the Committee on Finance, and I take this occasion to express my admiration for the work which it has done. At the same time I do not believe there is any member of that committee who would claim infallibility, nor will any member of the committee contend that there is much importance attached to the question as to where the credit shall lie for raising some of the rates in the bill since the committee made its report. The country, sir, is not concerned with the distribution of credit on the floor of the Senate as between the majority and the minority of the committee nearly as much as it is concerned as to what the outcome shall be. So with the permission of my colleagues I will not endeavor to throw any light upon that moot question which has been so often referred to.

Mr. President, I have listened to many of the addresses with very deep interest. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has made an exceedingly interesting address to-day, and I was particularly impressed with that portion of it in which he declared, at the beginning, his belief that this war was to be a long war, that it might not end within a year, and might go even further. I agree with him in the analysis of the military situation. It must be apparent to every person who endeavors to measure the forces that are at play in Europe and, in fact, over the world, that the contest is not drawing to an early close. The comparative disorganization of Russia, without any question, unless some other unlooked-for event takes place, may be said, I think, safely, to have added one year's time to the duration of the war. It is for the very reason, sir, that I am convinced we are in for a struggle which will last through a considerable period of time—and no man may prophesy accurately just what its duration will be—that I think it incumbent upon the Congress of the United States to build in its taxation measures a fiscal system which will withstand any strain which may be imposed upon it as the months and perhaps the years go by. If I could believe that the war would end within one year and that this, as a result, would be the only extraordinary tax bill to be presented to Congress, I would the more willingly follow the suggestions of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the suggestions of those who have contended, as he has contended to-day, that we should greatly increase the rates of taxation.

Mr. President, it would be difficult to fix a limit to the amount of money which can be raised by taxation in the United States during one year; and if it would suffice to raise all we could in the year 1918—to actually conscript wealth in order to win the war within that period—and if it were possible to do it, I would not contend against the utter and entire conscription of wealth. But, Mr. President, we must exercise some caution, some prudence; we must direct our examination toward the future and attempt, if we can, to calculate the weight of the burdens which may come to us in the year 1919, in the year 1920, perhaps, and even, sir, the burdens which may come to this country after the war is over; for, to put it mildly, we shall be confronted with some exceedingly interesting problems at the conclusion of this great war. So I say that, while I would be willing to assess the most drastic and well-nigh confiscatory tax if I felt absolutely certain that this burden would have to be carried for only one year, by the same course of reasoning, Mr. President, I am opposed to assessing at this time overdraft or nearly confiscatory taxes, because I am confident that we will have to carry these burdens for more than one year.

A good many efforts have been made during this debate to compare our condition with the condition of some of our allies, and to draw conclusions therefrom. That is a rather dangerous process, and some of the conclusions reached by that process can be very much in error. It has been said that we should do what England has done—not what England did at the beginning of the war, but what England is doing now. I shall not stop to compare the rates fixed in this tax bill as now written with the rates of taxation fixed in England at the beginning of the war, or the second year of her participation, or during this present year, but I shall endeavor to point out to the Senate that the industries and the commercial structures of England are on a very different basis than are the industries and the commercial structures of the United States.

England, sir, is an old country; her industries and her commerce have been long established. English bankers and merchants and manufacturers have been extending their operations all over the world since the close of the Napoleonic wars, at which time, if I remember history correctly, the great industrial and commercial expansion of England, coincident with the establishment of the modern factory system, commenced. It can truthfully be said that England's commerce and industries and banking have reached a degree of standardization that has not been reached in the United States; and I think the explanation is comparatively simple and must be conceded by any person who would compare the conditions of the two countries.

We are still expanding internally. Industrially speaking and commercially speaking we are still a new country; and I venture to say that it will be two or three or perhaps four generations before we shall reach that stage of standardization in our industries and business which is now occupied by the industries and business of England. It is, therefore, much easier, Mr. President, for an English statesman to measure the effect of taxation upon English industry. The cost of production within the borders of England of any article is practically uniform; the wage scales within the borders of England in a given industry are practically uniform; the charges for freight transportation in England are much less important in their relation to the cost of the finished product than are the transportation charges in the United States. England being a small, compact country, it is not nearly so difficult for the British Government to measure the effect of, we will say, a war-profits tax upon the industries of England, because their degree of standardization is so far advanced that it is reasonably known in advance just what burdens they can bear.

When the war broke out industry in England was not in a process of marked expansion; it was moving along settled lines, well-established channels; and a statistician or economist could calculate exactly what burdens the industries of England could withstand from year to year. So it may seem upon first thought that they moved more boldly than we have with respect to the rates recited in the respective tax laws. They appear to have taxed their industries at a little higher rate; but, Mr. President, our industries have been going through a remarkable evolution during the last three years, all the more remarkable because when compared to their condition during the three prewar years, which were subnormal, their prosperity appears comparatively large. Our three prewar years were abnormal years, just as our three years of the war have been abnormal years; and it is very difficult to take those two periods and compare them with the two like periods in Great Britain or even in France and say to the industries of America, "We will do you exactly what England and France did to their industries."

It is perfectly true that some of the manufacturing industries of the United States have been tremendously prosperous during the last three years; it is perfectly true that some very large fortunes have been accumulated, although there are not nearly as many of them as some sections of the press would have the public believe. I think no one will contend that those fortunes and those industries should escape their just burden of taxation; but while we are attempting to measure the burden which they can carry—and they are the conspicuous few—we must take into consideration the burden which the average business institution can carry. When we come to the average business institution we do not find any such remarkable condition of affairs.

Much has been said upon the floor about the effect of this proposed tax law upon the United States Steel Corporation, upon the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, and upon the Du Pont Powder Co. I have been tempted to believe that there are some Senators here who think that our tax laws should be so framed as to suit and meet the conditions of those three companies without much regard to the great number of other organizations in the United States. So often have they been cited as examples, horrible or otherwise, that I have been tempted on more than one occasion to suggest that a separate tax bill be drawn applicable to them alone, and then we might get down to a discussion of a tax bill applicable to the ordinary industries of the United States.

There have been some rather remarkable comments made upon finance and economy in the discussion of the affairs of some of these great corporations. The Senator from Washington to-day stated very plainly on two or three occasions that he had no concern for percentages; that the people of the United States, the patriotic people of the United States, had no concern for percentages; but I think one is entitled to inquire how we are to measure any burden of taxation except by the percentage system? When a question is asked a Senator who is explaining his theory of taxation and that question includes an inquiry as to what percentage the net profits of a corporation bear to its invested capital and the reply is made that that is of no importance and of no concern to a Senator or to the public, I wonder how the industries of the United States would thrive under that kind of financial management, for before we do anything else in managing a business or writing a tax bill we must resort to percentages to find out where we are.

I fear also, Mr. President, that the impression has been created, or has been sought to be created, that the two or three great corporations that have been so often named and about which I know very, very little, are owned by one, two, three, or four men, respectively. One of the purposes of my question addressed to the Senator from Washington with respect to the United States Steel Corporation was to ascertain, if possible, what effect his theory of taxation would have upon the stockholders of the United States Steel Co., of whom, I believe there are 100,000, the great majority of whom, I understand, are comparatively poor people, many of them being mechanics working in the steel mills. But that apparently, according to the Senator from Washington, is not an important question; it is of no concern to the Senate or to the public.

Mr. President, it has been suggested that it would be a judicious and proper exercise of the taxing power so to fix the taxes upon war profits or excess profits, whichever we shall call them, as to leave no dividends to the stockholders. That was the clear intimation made in the argument this afternoon. May I suggest that we can do that for just one year, but after one year's attempt at any such taxation as that the United States would be prostrate and we would be defeated in this war? I think it well, sir, to straighten out a few of these ideas, if I may presume to do so or to attempt to do so, because, having been inserted in the Record, it goes out to the country that it is wise and proper to disregard the stockholders of corporations, who are American citizens and dependent by the thousands upon some dividends, at least, to maintain themselves.

We can not eat our cake and have it. As I said at the beginning, we can raise almost any amount of money the first year, but if we make it impossible for people to continue in business upon an expanding scale by taking away from them too much of their surplus or all of their surplus, at the end of one year the business of the United States will be stagnant.

There are only two directions in which business can move—forward or backward. When I used the term "stagnant," sir, I used an inaccurate expression, for a business that is stagnant is in effect going backward. No business stands still. It is either going forward or it is going backward, and the thing which should concern us more than anything else in writing a tax law, particularly in the first year of a war when to a large extent our tax measures must be experimental, is that we shall guarantee the continued expansion and forward movement of our industries. Mr. President, we can not have a forward movement, we can not have expansion of industry if the Government takes all the surplus profit. Instead, we are bound to have industrial collapse; and there is no more effective method of bringing our Nation to ultimate military defeat than by causing an industrial collapse through the imposition of taxes which will drain the country of its surplus of financial resources.

What are the functions of large profits? What are the functions of large incomes? I have heard it stated here that the large profits that have been heaped up by corporations during the last three years—and without any doubt there have been some very large profits—have been heaped up, and, to quote the language of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] "have been stored away"; painting the picture to the public that these millions or billions, as the case may be—I do not count myself accurate in statistics—earned by our business concerns during the last three years have gone into the pockets of a few people and have been spent, if spent at all, solely upon luxuries; stored away, presumably, if the picture is carried out with due regard to the artistic necessities, to purchase automobiles, to build palaces, to maintain yachts. But, Mr. President, I venture to say that the vast majority of the so-called war profits have been reinvested in expanded plants; and thank Heaven, sir, that has been done, for had it not been done it would have proved impossible for us to equip our Army and our Navy for the war that we embarked upon last April.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. Is the Senator from New York aware that one great concern in this country, whose name he has given in his very interesting remarks, received an order from a department of the Government requiring it to make practically a twenty-million-dollar extension, under the admonition from the governmental head that if these extensions were not made the Government itself would be impelled to take charge of the plant and operate it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have heard of that case. I have no personal or direct knowledge of it; but I believe the statement of the Senator from Ohio to be true that the particular corporation to which he refers invested $20,000,000 to expand its plant in order to meet governmental needs. Rather than calling it something reprehensible to have accumulated profits during this war, and rather than to try to arouse the prejudices and the passions of the people of the United States against concerns that have made these profits, I am glad that they have made them, in order that that corporation could marshal $20,000,000 to invest to meet the needs of the Government.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield again.

Mr. HARDING. I should like the Senator to put in the record of his very interesting speech the fact that the expansions were made to furnish the Government its needs at prices fixed by the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My recollection of the incident is that the price is to be fixed by the Government at a later time.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator from New York that in all probability, if this company did invest $20,000,000 in additions to its plant at this time, when business conditions return to normal it will have to charge off about $10,000,000 in order to get back to the normal standard and to the costs which would have resulted in normal times?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely right, and I am inclined to believe that he has understated the matter. Upon the invitation of the Government, literally dozens and scores of these much-abused business concerns have used these so-called war profits, which the Senator from Idaho has depicted as being stored away in the pockets of the few, and are using them to-day in the service of the country to meet the needs of the Government by expanding their plants to construct field artillery, heavy artillery, shrapnel shells, and supplies of every kind and description for the Army and the Navy. We are fortunate, Mr. President, that that is the state of affairs under which we commenced this war.

Now, sir, we do not know how long this war is going to go on. This tax bill, if I remember correctly—and if not the Senator from North Carolina can correct me—is to take $1,200,000,000 of war profits in 1918 from this class of concerns; and it is not a confined class. It is a very large and widely extended class of concerns. It would be surprising, I believe—and I wish I had the figures here—it would be surprising, I believe, if the Senate could know how widely scattered are the industries which are called upon to support this Government in the operations of the war. We are to take $1,200,000,000 from them, which in all frankness I say is a pretty round sum. Of course it is possible to take more. We could take $3,000,000,000 from them if we waited until the end of 1918 and sprung it on them quickly. We could take three and a half billions from them; but where would we be in 1919? There would be no more expansion. You can not expect any man or any company, great or small, to build an addition to his plant on air. He can not do it by borrowing money if the tax rates are so high as to frighten away the banker. He can only do it by using his surplus, accumulated out of a prosperous year's business.

It strikes me, Mr. President—and it is with some hesitation that I again refer to this war-profits tax, because we have settled it; but the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has constantly referred to it in his speech this afternoon—it strikes me that the committee has done the prudent thing, has done the wise thing. As the Senator from Washington says, this may not be our last tax bill. I am inclined to think it will not. It may be that we shall have to raise rates; it may be that we shall have to develop new forms of taxation if the burdens of the war become heavier and if it goes on for two or three or four years. But I venture to say that if some of the theories proposed upon this floor in the matter of taxation were written into this bill, and we did have in effect actual conscription of all the surplus profits, it would be our last tax bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Right in that connection I desire to say to the Senator there has been a persistent effort among certain Senators to create the impression throughout the country that we were not taking the percentage of profits that we ought to. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that many Senators in this debate have said that 50 per cent is the highest rate in any one bracket that will be collected from incomes. That is not so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Sixty-three per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Sixty-seven per cent. The present law imposes a tax of 17 per cent upon incomes over and above $2,000,000. Now, take the case of an individual whose percentage of the profits of a corporation earning 10 per cent per annum would be $1,000,000. Under the existing law and the pending bill we impose an excess-profits tax of 52½ per cent. On the $1,000,000 there would be collected $529,000. Deducted from the million dollars leaves $471,000. Then deduct the income tax on that amount, being 38½ per cent, amounts to $179,168.40, leaving for the individual, out of the $1,000,000, $291,831.60, providing he had no other income from any source. If his income was larger, the percentage of tax would be greater.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, let me say, by way of comment on the figures presented by the Senator from Utah, that that would certainly seem to be at least an approach to the conscription of wealth.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, before the Senator from New York gets away from this very interesting phase of finance and industrial operations I should like to have him refer to the fact that the stocks and bonds of industrial institutions and financial institutions in the United States have very naturally been given their valuation from the activities and profits incident to the last three years. Naturally, therefore, these bonds are in bank as collateral to loans on values adjusted for three years of activity during the European war. Has the Senator contemplated the effect on financial problems of greatly reducing the value of these collaterals by excessive demands upon these concerns?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if you impair the collateral, the bank of course will ask for more collateral or call the loan, and then you have severe financial disturbance.

I think the same observations may be made with respect to personal incomes that may be made with respect to the profits of business concerns, partnerships, or corporations. It is perfectly true, sir, that any man can live, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] said this afternoon, on $15,000 a year. It is perfectly true, he might just as well have said, that he could live on $10,000 or $5,000 a year. I have never felt any anguish over the sufferings of the rich during a war or at any other time. There is no means, whether by taxing or otherwise, by which we could starve the rich if we wanted to. They can always manage to survive by living on their capital. But there is a very important element other than the fixing of a standard at which any man may live and support his family and send his children to school, and that is the function to be performed by the surplus of that man's income.

The picture painted by the Senator from Nebraska would lead people to believe that the 121 persons—I think that is the number—who enjoy incomes in the United States of over $1,000,000 spend all that money for their personal luxuries, and that every man who happens to enjoy an income in excess of his actual living necessities spends it on idle luxuries. Mr. President, I venture to say that those who are fortunate enough to have these tremendous incomes spend a comparatively small proportion of them upon their living expenses. I venture to say, further, that the great proportion of the income goes back into productive activity in the form of new investments which build new concerns, employ more men, and develop resources all over the country. That is what has been going on in the United States ever since the Civil War—expansion, development. All of it comes, or nearly all of it comes, from making use of the surplus or the savings, whichever you choose to call it, out of the incomes of the people.

I think the best definition of capital that I have ever heard is that it is the organized savings of the people. Now, you are not helping the country, you are not helping the industries, you are not helping the war when you prevent people from saving; and I even apply that principle to the very rich. Do not think for a moment that I believe that the rates fixed in this bill are too high. I think the very rich man should pay 50 per cent on the top bracket; but the money even of the multimillionaire which he does not need and which he does not use for his own living expenses when reinvested and set to work in the form of organized capital and joined in with all the savings of all the other people in the country who save anything, is of more use to the United States for a two-year war or a three-year war or a four-year war than if it were all taken away from them and put in the Treasury in the year 1918.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not also true that for the surplus or the savings of which the Senator is speaking we must look principally for taking the loans?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can state better than I the effect on our credit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the existence of a generous surplus, unendangered, unthreatened by any law, is the one essential for the carrying on of a great modern war, where industrial organizations and industrial activities are so important. We can not be sure that we shall come to a successful conclusion in this tremendous effort by so arranging things that we shall make just enough money to live on, because if we make any miscalculation in that we shall fall down into utter destruction. We have got to make a generous calculation of the surplus that we shall leave in the hands of industry, that it may be reinvested; that it may expand and take up any slack that may occur in our commercial or industrial activities from time to time. There must be a generous margin of safety. And when the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] says that if he had his way he would take, out of the $490,000,000 of estimated profits of the United States Steel Corporation for 1918, all but $90,000,000 and leave only that $90,000,000 of net profits for that corporation, he would wreck the Steel Corporation.

Our whole shipbuilding program would be destroyed. The company could not live beyond the year 1918. Ninety million dollars would not enable it to pay even a dividend worthy of the name to their stockholders, let alone having any surplus to meet the strain of the years to come. If we adhere to any such principle, if we adopt any such theory of taxation, we shall lose this war instead of winning it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has said something about our credit. Of course it is dependent upon the industrial and agricultural and commercial prosperity of the country. I would not presume to attempt to address the Senate on that tremendously difficult and important topic, except most briefly.

Mr. President, it may be said that credit depends upon two things. When a man goes to a bank to borrow money the cashier wants to know two things about him: First, his character, and one of our greatest financiers said he placed more importance upon the character of his prospective borrower than upon his assets; and, second, the comparative prosperity of the business in which he desires to put the proceeds of his loan.

We will assume, Mr. President, that American industry enjoys a good character. The next thing the lender wants to know is about the prosperity of the industry in which he is going to invest the money, not this year alone, but what will be its condition next year when he will have to pay interest, and the year after that when he will have to pay interest, and the year after that when, perhaps, according to the terms of the loan, the lender may want all his principal back.

The credit of the Nation is on the same basis as the credit of an individual, and if we shall so fix our tax laws as to lead the lenders of the country into the belief that our industries will not be prosperous a year from now or two years from now, and will not be permitted to accumulate and use a generous surplus the credit of the country will be hurt. We will not be able to float bonds with that readiness and facility that would otherwise be the case.

Now, it is apparent to every man who stops to think that we can not pay for this war as we go, at least we could not do it except we confined it to one year which is, I imagine, conceded to be impossible. We must borrow money. The Government must borrow money on the credit and faith of the United States, and the thing that underlies a Government bond is the potential prosperity of the industries and the agriculture of the country. The Government can not cramp and stagnate industries with one hand through the taxing power and expect to borrow all the money it wants with the other hand. You can not extract blood from a stone.

For one, sir, I believe that the committee, in spite of the criticisms that have been fanned into a flame against it, in spite of the idea that is sought to be spread abroad that the so-called swollen fortunes and swollen corporation profits are not taxed enough—I believe that the Committee on Finance has been endowed with a true vision in this matter and has looked beyond the year 1918 and endeavored to estimate and analyze what will be our condition in 1919 and has refused to take any chance which if ill taken would bring disaster to us in this war.

We can tell better when 1919 comes whether this bill taxes industries and profits and fortunes sufficiently. My humble judgment is that it goes just about far enough, just about what those industries and fortunes will bear in the first year of a war. At the very best, with due respect to the members of the Committee on Finance, it is largely experimental. Neither they nor I nor any other Senator can tell exactly what the effect is going to be, but I do believe most sincerely, Mr. President, that it is wiser for us to proceed a little slowly, so that we shall not make it impossible for us to proceed with lightning and irresistible speed in that day and year when America shall strike the decisive blow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, many Senators have left the Chamber with the understanding that it would hardly be possible to secure a vote this afternoon. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., Thursday, September 6, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, September 7, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 6, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, O God our heavenly Father, for the ever abiding faith which in spite of the doubts, uncertainties, sorrows, and disappointments, binds us to Thee, which is ever moving us onward, upward to the better life, and promises the final consummation of all our longings, hopes, and aspirations.

Increase our faith and hold us close to Thee until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. Wood of Indiana to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John Toliver (H. R. 19997, Sixty-fourth Congress), no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADDITIONAL BONDS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5901, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of section 6. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the Secretary of the Treasury gave information to the committee as to what interest these war-saving certificates would bear. I believe he stated 4 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. Four per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I question very much, no matter how large a force nor how long that force may be employed, whether we will be able to raise by this method any amount approaching $2,000,000,000, as is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a commendable idea to enlist the support and try to get the savings of the poorer classes, those employed at small wages, invested in war-saving certificates; but the history of the savings-fund stamp certificates issued by the postal savings banks does not warrant us in believing that there will be anywhere near $2,000,000,000 raised by this method in aid of the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman understands that the postal savings fund draws only 2 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am aware of that, but I am further aware of the fact that the postal savings bank generally has been patronized largely only by certain of the foreign, the alien classes, in this country, who have been acquainted with that system of banking in their home countries. At the end of July, 1917, there was on deposit $136,000,000 in the postal savings banks of the country. Of that total $28,000,000 was deposited in the city of New York, $9,000,000 in the city of Brooklyn, and $6,500,000 in the city of Chicago. Those funds came largely from the foreign element in those cities. They were acquainted with the postal savings bank system in their home countries abroad. It is true that the depositors have to a limited extent used the postal saving stamp certificates in their deposits. When the postal savings bank bill was passed it was expected that in the course of a few years the total deposits would far exceed the amount they have now reached of $136,000,000.

In my investigation I was curious to ascertain whether during the period of our floating the liberty loan the deposits in postal savings banks had been lessened, and the head of the bureau informs me that during the month of June there was a material reduction in the average amount of postal savings bank deposits, aggregating only in that month $500,000, and that in July the postal savings bank deposits returned to the normal of about $4,000,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Was there any substantial withdrawal of deposits on hand?

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not make the direct inquiry, but I believe from the general information furnished me that there were no considerable withdrawals. In fact, as the gentleman knows and as the committee knows, the postal savings bank depositors under the law have two periods in the year at which to withdraw their funds to obtain postal savings bonds drawing 2½ per cent, namely, January 1 and July 1. They are privileged to deposit during the year at interest $1,000 and an additional $1,000 without interest, but they can take out bonds for the amount of their deposits on July 1 and January 1. Although they had the privilege of withdrawing their funds from the postal savings banks and investing them in liberty bonds, nevertheless on July 1 these postal-savings depositors withdrew $700,000 of their deposits and invested them not in the liberty bonds paying 3½ per cent interest, but in the postal-savings bonds paying 2½ per cent, showing clearly that these foreigners who were domiciled in this country are not sufficiently acquainted with the existing current of affairs to invest in the higher-priced securities, but that they follow the trend of their native countries and invest in the lower-priced securities of the postal savings bank, bonds drawing 2½ per cent. With only $136,000,000 as the total deposits in the postal savings banks, I question very much, especially in these times of high prices when the cost of living is so high, when flour costs so much and prices for food are maintained at a high level, that the laboring and artisan classes generally will be able to the extent of $2,000,000,000 in the course of any number of years to invest in these war-saving certificates bearing a rate of interest even of 4 per cent.

I do not wish to stand here in the attitude of a prophet, but I think the Government would be very fortunate, indeed, if it can secure as high as $500,000,000 instead of $2,000,000,000, no matter how energetic the postal officials and the Treasury officials may be in trying to have these certificates invested in by the laboring and working classes of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to page 9, line 5, which I will hand to the clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOWARD: Page 9, line 5, after the word "prices," insert the words "not less than four." In line 6, after the word "war-savings," insert the word "coupon." In lines 7 and 8 strike out the following: "On which interest to maturity may be discounted in advance at such rate or rates and computed in such manner as he may prescribe," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum and issued for any desired amount from $1 to $1,000 in even dollars," so that the line will read, beginning line 5, "at such price or prices not less than four and upon such terms and conditions as he may determine war-saving coupon certificates of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum and issued for any desired amount from $1 to $1,000 in even dollars." In line 19 strike out after "$2,000,000,000" all the language in the section.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, as an amendment to the pending bill I have asked that section 6 be changed so as to read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in addition to the bonds authorized by section 1 of this act and the certificates of indebtedness authorized by section 5 of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, for the purposes of this act and to meet public expenditures authorized by law, such sum or sums as in his judgment may be necessary and to issue therefor, at such price or prices, not less than par, and upon such terms and conditions as he may determine, war-savings coupon certificates of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum and issued for any desired amount from $1 to $1,000 in even dollars. Such war-savings certificates shall be in such form or forms and subject to such terms and conditions, and may have such provisions for payment thereof before maturity, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Each war-saving certificate so issued shall be payable at such time, not exceeding five years from the date of its issue, and may be redeemable before maturity, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The sum of such war-savings certificates outstanding shall not at any one time exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000,000.

The plan of the Treasury Department as to these war-savings certificates was outlined before the Committee on Ways and Means by the Secretary of the Treasury as follows:

This plan contemplates the issue of a war-savings-certificate book, each page of which will represent $5, and any man who wants to invest—I will use round figures to illustrate—$4 and have it bear interest, can take it to his post office and buy a $4 stamp, which would be put in the book and canceled, and then he would have an investment with the Government which would accumulate interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum for five years, and at the end of five years he would cash his certificate in at $5. He can then continue that accumulation until he gets $100, and then he can convert that, if he wants to, into a $100 bond. This method of war savings has been tried in Great Britain with very great success. They found that by bringing to the man of the smallest means the opportunity of making a saving in a simple manner they could not only add very much to the list of investors, but that they also had a very large resource upon which they could draw for the purposes of the war, and, in addition to that, they could encourage thrift and saving to a degree not heretofore thought of. The plan is to enable the smallest investor here to become interested in the bonds of his Government. Now, you may ask why we do not issue $5 certificates and pay interest on them every six months. That would mean that if we had millions of investors, as we probably should have and would have on this basis, the Treasury would be required each six months to pay 10 cents in interest on a $5 bond, which would manifestly be an impossible thing from an administrative standpoint.

It is better, therefore, to sell these certificates with the interest accumulated, so that it accumulates each year and is worth $5 at the end of the five years. Provision is also made in the bill that none of these certificates shall be held by any single investor beyond $1,000 in amount, so that they may be confined to men of small means; and it also provides that the Government will cash in the certificates at a lower rate of interest at any time upon demand of the holder, so that the man of small means, who buys a $5 certificate and finds himself under such pressure that he has to realize on it, can always go to the Government and get his money. In that event he would get a smaller rate of interest than 4 per cent; probably 2 per cent. It is necessary to give the man of small means this opportunity to cash in his certificate, because otherwise he might hesitate to come in. The British Government found that only one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of war-savings certificates they sold were offered for redemption, and I think we would have a like experience in this country if we should issue these certificates.

I am most strongly convinced, Mr. Chairman, that the idea of offering to sell Government obligations at a discount is a mistake, and will seriously impair the Government credit. Whatever may be the reason for selling a $5 five-year obligation of the Government at, say, $4.10—or at a price which, with 4 per cent per annum thereon, would amount to $5 at the maturity of the obligation—yet the effect of so doing in my judgment will be disastrous and will offer no compensating advantages. The class of people who will buy these war-savings certificates, and whose aid in financing the war is to be thereby secured, are not familiar with bonds or with the principles of finance. They do not know the distinction between discount and interest. They will doubtless question the ultimate value of an obligation which is offered to them at a discount. If it is explained to them that the 4 per cent interest is included in the face of the obligation, they will figure that 4 per cent on $5 is 20 cents, and that five times 20 cents is $1. Consequently they will argue that the $5 certificate should be sold to them for $4 instead of at, say, $4.10, which would really make the certificates bear more than 4 per cent.

I understand that the Treasury Department hopes to educate the people to an understanding of these nice distinctions; but the task is hopeless, so far as I can judge. The proposition is to sell $2,000,000,000 of these war-savings certificates, practically on a $5 basis. This means the sale of 400,000,000 of these $5 certificates, or an average of four such certificates to each man, woman, and child in the United States. It means educating the entire population in this matter within a few months. It can not be done.

Moreover, in practice my understanding is that the Treasury Department proposes to sell not $5 certificates but to sell stamps of varying denominations. These stamps are to be purchased and pasted in a book. When the amount of $4.10—or thereabouts—is so secured, the holder becomes entitled to receive for such $4.10 the sum of $5 at the end of five years from that date. He receives no interest during the period of accumulation.

Nor does he receive a certificate when he has accumulated the $4.10. In order to receive the actual certificate he must keep up this accumulating process until he has purchased stamps enough to entitle him to a certificate for $100. When this needed amount (about $82) is so accumulated in stamps he surrenders his book of stamps and receives a $100 certificate, payable in five years; and the interest on the various sums of $4.10 that he has accumulated from the time each $4.10 is purchased until the $100 certificate is delivered, is, I presume, to be adjusted in some way that I do not understand.

To complicate the matter still further, it is provided that not more than $100 of such certificates can be sold to any one person at one time, and that no person can hold more than $1,000 of them at one time. This means that an individual account must be kept with each person, in order to see that he does not violate the law. If every purchaser bought the maximum amount of $1,000 it would require 2,000,000 people to absorb two billions of certificates, and 2,000,000 individual accounts would have to be kept. The cost would be prohibitive, and there is no object in it. The Government needs the money, and I can see no reason for limiting the amount which its citizens are willing to lend it.

I could bring out many other reasons against the proposed plan were my time not limited. To me it seems impracticable, costly, unnecessary, and undesirable. I believe the reasons stated are sufficient to maintain this view, and consequently I will devote the remainder of my time to suggesting and advocating an alternative method, which can be used under the section as I have amended it.

From letters, discussions, and arguments which have been brought to my attention, I have been most strongly impressed with the necessity of creating a nation-wide market for Government securities, and I shall quote liberally from these in the argument I shall present in this connection.

It is submitted that the following statements can not be successfully controverted:

First. The people of the United States are to-day in better financial condition than ever before in their history. They are abundantly able to purchase any amount of Government bonds that may be offered—up to thirty or forty billions, if needed.

Second. They are unreservedly behind the administration in its efforts to speedily prosecute this war to a successful conclusion, and are willing to make any sacrifices necessary to that end.

Third. They absolutely believe in the principles of this Government, and are convinced that it has entered this war only to preserve the liberties of mankind, and to make possible the continuance of democratic institutions.

Fourth. They recognize that the Government of the United States is financially the strongest in the world, and that its obligations or bonds are the best investment that can be secured.

Fifth. They are willing and anxious to help the Government in any way that they can, and are constantly seeking guidance as to the most effective method of doing this.

Sixth. Taken as a whole, the 100,000,000 of American people constitute to-day the greatest potential market for Government securities that the world has ever seen. That potential market must be made actual to be effective.

Seventh. The wide distribution of Government securities among the masses of the people insures stability in the market value of Government bonds. It encourages and increases patriotism by giving to every citizen a financial stake in the Government; and by emphasizing to each citizen the fact that it is his Government, looking to and dependent on him; and needing his financial assistance, whether that assistance be measured in dollars or in millions.

Eighth. The creation of a country-wide market for Government bonds will be greatly fostered by a patriotic sentiment that each citizen should own a bond, and that the person who fails to help his Government financially is a "slacker."

But, on the other hand, the following statements are equally true:

First. The American people have never been educated in the direct purchase from the Government of its securities. Probably not one man in a thousand has ever seen a Government bond. Probably not even that percentage has ever owned one. Every citizen has been and is ambitious to own them. But Government bonds have heretofore been taken by the banks and by wealthy corporations and individuals. To the ordinary citizen they have been surrounded with mystery and have seemed unattainable. If he has ever thought of buying one, he has not known how to go about purchasing it.

Second. While the liberty-loan bonds have been offered in denominations as low as $50, yet there are many millions of our citizens who have not as much as $50 to invest. While many banks have arranged to allow purchasers to pay for their bonds in small weekly or monthly installments, there are many millions of our people who do not in these troublous times care to make promises for future payments.

Third. The man of small means; the wage earner, who has a small weekly surplus; the women and children, are accustomed to paying cash for their purchases. They want to see the goods before they pay the money. When they pay, they want the goods delivered. If satisfied with the goods, they will buy more of them next week, or whenever they have surplus funds.

Fourth. It is difficult to make the citizen of small means appreciate that his financial support may be vital to the Government. He can not understand that his few dollars may mean the success or failure of a transaction involving billions. He has never appreciated that these loans must be absorbed by the repeated investments of the small amounts available to the wage earners out of their weekly earnings.

Fifth. No effective public sentiment against the citizen who fails to help his country financially can ever be created while the minimum contribution which he can make is $50. The glory of our country is that it is no disgrace to be poor. No man can or should feel humiliation because he can not provide a minimum of $50. Such a sentiment can and should be created only when bonds are available at accessible points in any desired denomination from $1 up. Then not only every man, but every member of every family, can fairly be expected to help according to their means.

Mr. Chairman, the financing of a war for the preservation of democracy should be upon all the people and should be conducted in the most democratic manner. With universal service, rich and poor alike must render military aid. Likewise, rich and poor alike should render financial service, according to their abilities. To each should be offered for sale an exactly similar bond, differing only in amount. These bonds should be offered in any desired denominations at convenient and accessible points, namely, post offices, banks, express offices, and so forth. The man with $1 or $3 or $10,000 should alike be able to see the goods which he is expected to purchase, and to receive them immediately when paid for. The same facilities should be offered to all, as is now the case at the post offices, where the purchaser of a 1-cent post card receives the same treatment as the purchaser of $10,000 worth of stamps. The $1 loaned by the poor newsboy should be received in the same spirit as the five million loaned by the great corporation. To each should be given a coupon or registered bond, as desired, similar in appearance and differing fundamentally only in amount.

We can not have a really popular loan until bonds are offered at convenient points in any desired denominations to all the people, and until thereby it can be impressed on every man, woman, and child in the country that the Government needs their continued help and has provided for securing it by furnishing equal facilities to all alike by offering its bonds in any desired denominations from $1 up.

While it may be claimed that the sale of a $50 bond by the banks on a $1 weekly installment payment encourages thrift, yet this argument fails in the last analysis. If a $50 bond sold on the installment plan encourages thrift, a $100 bond sold on the same plan will encourage it more, and a $1,000 bond still more. Then why sell bonds smaller than $1,000? But the trouble is to get your customer to buy at all. The sale of war bonds can not wait until the American people are educated in thrift; it can not be made contingent on the idea of having our citizenry convinced of the wisdom of pledging their future earnings to the purchase of unfamiliar goods or securities. First let them buy the goods in small quantities and become familiar with their quality. This in itself will educate them as to their value and encourage them to further investment.

When a new and meritorious article is put on the market, frequently the manufacturer offers sample packages to the public, costing a nominal sum, or even gives away these packages, so that they may test the value of his wares, recognizing that a knowledge of this value and familiarity with its merits will create and build up a large retail trade. His problem is to familiarize the people with his goods and their merits, to start them buying. In this way he creates the demand that ultimately builds up the large and successful business.

The same principles must apply to the retailing of Government bonds. They must be sold not only to the thrifty but to the improvident; not only to people familiar with savings-bank methods but to people who never heard of a savings bank.

Their sale can not wait on the education of the people in habits of thrift. They must be used as a means of so educating them. There is no valid reason why the man with $1 should be asked to deal with the Government indirectly. Under the $1-per-week installment plan he must deal through a bank, which he may mistrust. Until he completes his installment he has only the receipt of the bank as evidence of his payments. Why should not the Government directly give him its receipt for the amount paid in the shape of its $1 or $3 or $7 bond and be educating him in and familiarizing him with Government securities during the installment period?

Three things are essential to successful retail salesmanship: The goods offered must be of satisfactory quality; they must be offered at convenient and accessible points, where the prospective purchaser can see and examine them; and they must be offered in form and size of package to meet the wishes and the financial ability of the customer. These requirements are as essential in selling bonds as in selling groceries or dry goods.

And it must be remembered that in offering its bonds directly to the general public the Government has become a retailer; it has eliminated the middleman or wholesaler, and it must observe the principles which apply to all retail selling.

The dry-goods house which offered ladies' suits costing $50 but nothing cheaper would have a very limited trade, even though it offered to sell these suits on installments. In order to do a volume of business they must offer suits at varying prices to meet the requirements of all the community which they serve.

This is the day of small things. One of the greatest businesses in this country is the moving-picture business, where 5 and 10 cents is charged for admission and where the returns are based on the volume of business done.

The street car business, with its hundreds of millions of invested capital, is based on a 5-cent fare.

The Post Office, with its hundreds of millions of income, is largely based on the 2-cent stamp.

The same principle, I should judge, must apply to Government financing. In order that the full financial power of the Nation may be developed, Government bonds must be in denominations to suit the requirements of all the people, and must be offered for sale at points where all the people can buy them.

I understand that the Boy Scouts are required to earn and deposit in bank $1 as a condition of becoming a second-class Scout. The organization could readily require these boys, in place of this, to own a Government bond for $1. This would emphasize the patriotic purposes of the organization and help the boys to appreciate that they were aiding their country. Likewise, with men and women of small means.

Mr. Chairman, the new tax bill will fall very heavily on men of large means who ordinarily buy securities of this class. The investment funds held by people of large means consist in the income from money already invested. They do not keep on hand enormous amounts of uninvested capital. The Government is taxing this income very heavily. The demands for additional capital by railroads and industrial corporations to furnish facilities needed for war requirements will result in large inducements in the way of interest and dividend returns, which will tend very largely to absorb the investment capital held by people of large means. They will say, and with some show of justice, that they have already invested largely in the liberty bonds, and that they are contributing largely to the cost of the war through the enormous tax on their income. They will maintain that, under these circumstances, there can be no criticism of their investing the remainder of their surplus income in industrial enterprises. And such investment by them in industrial enterprises will be absolutely essential to enable these industrial enterprises to expand and enlarge their activities so as to meet the war requirements of the Government. As a result, I do not believe that the men with large incomes can be counted on to absorb the great future bond issues which the Government must put out.

On the other hand, the wage earner will be in a better position than he ever has been. The expenditure of these enormous sums borrowed by the Government will necessarily increase wages and give every man a job. These wage earners, taken as a whole, can contribute millions upon millions weekly to the help of the Government, provided the Government offers its securities in amounts suited to their purse and provided these securities are sold at convenient places. To do this, of course, the Government must impress on the wage earner and small investor that their cooperation is essential, that the Government is dependent and must be dependent upon their assistance, and that it is their patriotic duty to invest, and to continue to invest, from week to week their surplus earnings in Government bonds.

In my humble opinion the wisest thing that the Treasury Department could do would be to establish a bureau to handle the flotation of Government securities during this war. That bureau should immediately adopt some method by which coupon bonds could be sold at post offices, banks, express offices, and other local points, including large manufacturing plants and railroads, in any denomination from $1 up, to the masses of the people. That bureau should, through the newspapers and through all means of legitimate publicity, impress upon the people that each one of them must help, and that no contribution is too small to be received. It should impress upon the people the need of the country for financial backing and the fact that this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and unless all the people support it according to their means it can not succeed. The quicker the Government realizes the necessity of putting itself in touch with this inexhaustible market composed of all the people, and of dealing directly with the people, and of impressing upon the people that they must all support the Government, the better off it will be. Unless they do this there is going to be great difficulty in floating Government loans, with a consequent unfortunate effect upon the war. I am very firmly of the opinion that unless they do this and do it quickly Government bonds will go to a discount and sell below par, or else a much higher rate of interest will have to be paid, because the man receiving a large income and paying a large part of that income in taxes to the Government is not going to invest the balance of his surplus income in Government bonds as a matter of sentiment or patriotism. If the Government depends on him for additional help after he has already subscribed to large blocks of bonds and after he has paid about half of his surplus income in taxes, then the Government must offer him a security, paying a rate as high as the interest or dividend returns upon the railroad and industrial bonds and stocks that will unquestionably be offered to meet the enormous war requirements of the situation.

I am convinced that the wisest thing that could be done would be the establishment of such a bureau as suggested in the Treasury Department, and the adoption of some method for the sale of bonds in any denomination from $1 up at convenient points, and for a campaign of publicity as indicated. The people have got to be convinced of the seriousness of the situation and of the necessity of universal help. Moreover, such a plan would enormously increase patriotic feeling and help the Government indirectly about as much as it would directly.

I understand that in England one person in every six owns a Government bond. If the ratio of ownership were the same in this country, there would be about 17,000,000 holders of Government bonds. With a denomination as low as $1, I can not help but think that probably forty or fifty million people in this country would ultimately purchase and trade in Government securities, creating the broadest market and the most stable market that has ever been built up in human history.

It is very possible that a bond of small denomination would be used to some extent as a currency. It would not be a legal tender or debt, because the legal-tender qualification would not be given to it. The bonds (even for $1) with coupons attached could be made payable, both as to principal and interest, to the purchaser, if desired, thereby restricting their negotiability and making necessary the indorsement by the purchaser of the bond and each coupon in order to accomplish a transfer. Or the bonds could be made payable to the purchaser and the coupons made payable to bearer, or both bonds and coupons could be made payable to bearer.

While it might be true that the bonds of small denominations might become a circulating medium and be used as currency to a certain extent, is not this rather an advantage than a disadvantage, and what is the objection to it? The bonds and coupons are obligations of the Government, payable at fixed times and not before. It is immaterial to the Government whether they are held by Smith, Jones, or Brown, so far as their payment is concerned. On the other hand, if Smith, who purchased a bond, knows that he can at any time dispose of his bond either for cash or for groceries or clothing or for any other necessities, and that he will not have to get a broker to sell it for him, will not Smith be more disposed to put his surplus earnings into a security which is cashable at any time, and which he can dispose of at the corner grocery or cigar store whenever desired?

Regarding the details involved in paying a large number of small coupons, I do not think that this is a fair objection. In the first place, the simplest method ever devised for paying interest is through the coupon bond, where there is a separate slip of paper or coupon for each interest payment. These coupons would be Government checks for a specific amount, payable on a specific date at the United States Treasury. In actual practice the coupons would be cashed by local stores, turned into the local banks, tabulated and arranged by them, forwarded by them to the Federal reserve banks with machine-made lists of the same, and credited by the Federal reserve banks as cash, being then forwarded by the Federal reserve banks to the Treasury for payment. In other words, under this arrangement the work of cashing these coupons would be carried on almost entirely by the banks, who would gladly do the work in order to get the money on deposit, and the direct burden of labor on the Treasury would probably be smaller than is necessary where the Treasury issues bonds in large denominations only and issues its checks direct for the payment of interest.

I appreciate, however, that at first glance there would appear to be an enormous cost and an enormous amount of detail work involved in the engraving of separate forms of coupon bonds for each denomination from $1 up. I happen to know, however, that this apparent difficulty has been met and overcome. A party whom I have met has worked out a form of coupon bond by which with only one form a bond can be issued in any amount from $1 up with coupons attached. The value and due date of these coupons are mechanically indicated at the time of issue of the bonds so as to correctly accord with the face of the bonds. This device has been fully explained to the Treasury Department, and, while it has been patented, the owner has offered its use to the Government free of cost for the sale of these war-savings certificates.

Believing that the plan outlined in the bill is impracticable and that a better plan is available, I have offered the amendment in the belief that it will simplify and aid this financing of Government requirements and will hasten the time when all Government issues of bonds will be offered to the people directly in any desired denominations and at accessible points—the time when the Government will deal directly with its citizens in all its financial matters.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the section of the bill which my friend from Georgia attacks is not a new method of financing by any means. This provision was taken evidently from the English and Canadian provisions, the advantage of which has been thoroughly tested and tried out in a highly successful manner during the present war.

The theory on which it seems to have been based is the policy of utilizing, not this one method of short-term financing, but several similar methods, in connection with long-term loans. The English policy, which has worked so admirably, has embraced, along with this war-saving certificate plan, three or four other short-term plans. They have the war-expenditure certificates; they also have the exchequer bonds and the treasury notes or the treasury bill in addition. They have, in other words, about five different kinds of issues of a short-term character, the purpose of which is to drain into the treasury every day in the year the accumulations and savings and profits of the public.

That policy enables the treasury to supply itself with funds at every stage of the war. If we should rely upon long-term bonds alone we would have to issue them constantly. Under the present method of financing in England they have had only three long-term loans. They have had them at distant intervals. They have resulted in not only securing new money, but in absorbing excessive and other portions of this short-term paper that has been issued for the purpose of accumulating in the treasury the profits and earnings of the people as they accrue. As I remember, they have been able to derive some $500,000,000 so far under the war-saving certificate plan, and I think that in view of the fact that England has financed more little wars and more big wars than any other country on the planet, and inasmuch as she has tried out this and these other short-term methods for three years with entire success, we would do well to adopt her example.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Why did the committee see proper to limit the investment in this particular character of bond to any one individual to a thousand dollars and to limit the investment at any particular time to $100, when these bonds bear identically the same rate of interest as the bonds issued in $10,000 blocks? Why not allow an individual to spend $5,000 if he has it?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that brings up a somewhat general discussion to cover the entire question. It has been found that there are different types of people. Some prefer to put their savings in the postal savings banks. Others prefer to deposit them in the private savings banks. Still others prefer to put them in the long-term bonds. It depends upon their condition and the use to which they expect to place their earnings. It depends whether they want to utilize them to-morrow, or next week, or perhaps not until the expiration of some years. It depends entirely upon their conditions and surroundings.

Now, to illustrate: When the last English loan was made the friends of the English postal savings banks were very much alarmed. They thought that a 5½ per cent loan of a long-term character would result in withdrawing all deposits from the postal savings banks, which received only 2½ per cent interest under the law. But quite the contrary was the case, although there were considerable withdrawals. When the $5,000,000,000 loan was floated, paying 5½ per cent interest, only $90,000,000 was withdrawn from the English postal savings banks, and on the occasion of the previous 4½ per cent loan only $120,000,000 was withdrawn from the savings banks. This only illustrates the fact that there are different classes of people in this country whose purposes would incline them to adopt one or another or still a different kind of these temporary certificates or temporary loan agencies that are proposed in this measure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] has well said, the system that has been proposed in section 6 has already been tried out and tested. My friend, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], is always interesting, invariably entertaining, and often instructive; but I think he can hardly have studied this paragraph with sufficient care, or even his own proposition.

Let us understand, in the first place, the object of this section 6. It is to encourage and stimulate thrift amongst the classes that have not heretofore practiced it. These countries that have been in war, notably England and Canada, have found as the war progressed that there were certain industries highly stimulated by the war, in which high wages were paid, far above anything that had ever been paid before, and that the working classes who received these wages were inclined in many instances not to use their money for useful purposes. For instance, the sales of jewelry, especially cheap jewelry, largely rose in England; the sales of cheap silks greatly increased, and it became evident that if possible the waste in this form ought to be stopped. So this system was established for the purpose in England and Canada of encouraging this sort of thrift and stimulating the investment of savings among the people. Committees were organized, something on the line of committees organized to stimulate the sales of liberty bonds. Working people were encouraged to invest. They were getting higher wages than they had been receiving before, and there was a possibility of their saving, and by personal appeal they were asked to put their money in this class of bonds. These efforts were highly successful.

But I think, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] said—and I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] there also—that unless some effort is made to stimulate the interest of our working people and to market this class of bonds there never will be any $2,000,000,000 of them sold, and I do not know that the Secretary of the Treasury ever contemplated that there would be that amount. But it was desired that a limit should be placed upon this class of bonds. To me the reason why a limit is placed in the latter part of this section upon the amount that may be purchased at any one time, and on the amount that any person may hold, is because special privileges are, or at least may be, given to the holders of these certificates. The House will notice, of course, that there is no specific rate prescribed upon these bonds.

It is expected that they will be marketed at about 4 per cent, but the privilege of discount is given, which would slightly raise the rate of interest. In fact, it is intended that some slight inducements should be given, in order to make it an object to the working people to invest their money in these bonds, and if possible largely increase their savings. No account will be required to be kept. That is one thing that is fully provided for. The discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury is such that he can prescribe this stamp system of noting and keeping track of the amounts that have been paid in on these bonds, so that it will not be necessary to keep any account. These bonds can be marketed through the postmasters in that way. Stamps can be affixed to a card. No record whatever is necessary.

My friend fears that some people might violate the provision with reference to the total amount which they could possess, and he says it will be necessary to keep some record to avoid that. Possibly that is true, but I have no fear that anybody, for the sake of the slight advantage that there would be in these bonds over other bonds—it is very slight indeed—would ever violate this provision forbidding him to hold over $1,000 in amount.

So that on the whole this provision has been very carefully worked out, as it seemed to the committee, and it met with the unanimous approval of all of its members. I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] should be rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield before he takes his seat?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that of all the matters brought to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee by the Secretary of the Treasury, none received his more cordial indorsement than this war savings proposition.

There are two questions about this paragraph to which I had expected to call attention, but I will leave them for discussion by the chairman of the committee, if he cares to enter into the discussion. One is that this is a new departure, in that the interest is practically paid in advance. The certificates are discounted, and not paid in full until maturity. Hence what would appear to be an available $2,000,000,000 for expenditures for war purposes will necessarily be cut down to the principal minus the interest virtually paid in advance. In this particular case, if the certificates should be taken out in full, and should run to maturity for the full period of five years, there would be available for expenditure not $2,000,000,000, but $1,600,000,000.

The other point to which I desire to call attention, and which I think the chairman of the committee ought to explain, affects deposits in savings funds throughout the country and in other institutions that are intended to encourage thrift. This second proposition is that while the matter of the fixing of the rate of interest is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in this instance it appears, as his plans work out, that he would probably pay in the end more than 4 per cent interest. I think he conceded that he would be obliged to pay a fraction more than 4 per cent. That may have its effect upon savings funds elsewhere, and it may also affect the sale of the other bonds; because if these war-savings bonds are to be sold at more than 4 per cent, it may be that some persons who would otherwise invest in the regular bonds would seek these bonds to the prejudice of the others.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not more than 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow me just a minute before he begins?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say with respect to this provision, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], that it is not expected that we will get $2,000,000,000 or $1,500,000,000 in one year from the war-saving certificates plan. If we get $1,500,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 during the existence of the war it will be money well and easily procured. I think we will get at least $500,000,000 within the next 10 or 12 months. We can issue the certificates any time during the war—the last year of the war, the last months of the war, but their maturity is not to extend over five years from the date of issue and there shall never be outstanding at any one time more than $2,000,000,000.

The reason and wisdom of this provision has been so well stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] and by the suggestions in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that I will not further discuss them.

I wish, however, to refer briefly to the plan suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], since he is pretty confident that if he had an hour he would convince 99 out of every 100 Members of this House, and I think he was sincere in that belief.

Mr. HOWARD. That is, provided everybody was listening.

Mr. KITCHIN. In his 10 minutes talk he may have convinced, perhaps, a proportionate percentage of the Members here that his plan is plausible, feasible, and sound. The best thing about his plan is the foundation for the picture that he drew of the farmer coming to town and going to the post office and putting up his hard-earned dollar and getting a dollar bond of the United States Government, carrying it back home and showing it to his wife and children and saying, "Old lady and children, I am a bondholder, I am the owner of a bond of the United States of America." He says that millions of the American people are unable to buy more than a dollar's worth of bonds.

Well, suppose we should reduce the denomination of the bonds down to $1 and make them coupon bonds, as his amendment provides, and put on each $1 bond running for five years 10 coupons of 2 cents each, the interest payable semiannually. Just imagine this old man going to the post office and buying his $1 bond, carrying it back home and showing it to his wife and children. Then, when six months have rolled around and coupon-clipping time has arrived, he calls them all around the fireside and they get out the scissors and he clips off of that $1 bond a 2-cent interest coupon, puts it in an envelope, puts a 2-cent stamp on it, and sends it to the Treasury, and then anxiously waiting for the United States to send him back a Treasury warrant or check for 2 cents interest. [Laughter.] Then, at the end of another six months the family gather around, his wife gets out the scissors and he clips another coupon for 2 cents interest, puts it in an envelope and places a 2-cent stamp on it, and sends it to the United States Treasury and gets back another 2-cent check. What emotions of pride, what a bond-holding, coupon-clipping sensation would fill his heart! [Laughter.] I want to say to my friend from Georgia, on behalf of these millions of poor folks who, he says, will take his dollar-coupon bonds, that the only thing they would get out of their investment would be the pride, emotion, and sensation. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman from North Carolina has a most vivid imagination and sometimes draws upon it at great length. The gentleman from Georgia made no such preposterous proposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is in the gentleman's own amendment. Did he not strenuously contend for a dollar bond and did he not picture the old fellow going home with his dollar bond and exhibiting it to his family?

Mr. HOWARD. I said these bonds ought to be sold in multiples of a dollar and exchanged for a larger bond when they had accumulated a certain amount.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is it possible that I misunderstood the gentleman? The gentleman was in favor of providing bonds of one dollar up to a thousand. Here is his amendment. It provides for coupon bonds of denominations of $1 up to $1,000. Under his provision you would have to have a hundred thousand clerks, and how many million pages of bookkeeping would you have to have to keep track of these little bonds to the number of millions? How many million warrants and checks would have to be drawn for each 2 cents semiannual interest, and so forth?

Mr. HOWARD. How many million stamps will they have to have under this provision of the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would take 1,000,000,000 American people each buying one of these dollar bonds in order to raise a billion dollars revenue for the Government. I really do not believe that the plan of the gentleman is feasible. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to make a speech, but I am going to make some remarks. I begin with two or three which I hope the gentlemen in the Press Gallery will see to it are printed in every newspaper in the United States. A great many people, newspapers and others, have been jumping on Congress from time to time with more or less vigor for not expediting the business of this colossal war in which we are now engaged. I have a right to speak for the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

I undertake to say that no House of Representatives in the same length of time has transacted as much business as this House has transacted and of the most vital importance. [Applause.] It has done it with great expedition, and I am not certain but that it has acted sometimes with too much expedition.

They criticize the House for taking two whole days to pass a $7,000,000,000 bond bill, the vastest sum ever raised that way by any legislative body in the entire history of the human race. They pounded us because we did not do it in one day! I am not going to say a word about the other branch of Congress, but I do say that this House has done its duty and its whole duty, and has done it with great rapidity. [Applause.] The truth is that there has been no trace of politics in it. [Applause.] I am glad to say that the Republicans have acted just as faithfully and promptly as we have. [Applause.] A man sitting up in the gallery during this session of Congress, who did not know the Members, could not have told to save his soul whether this is a Democratic House or a Republican House, except that I preside over it. [Applause.] And I am not certain that he could have told then because it took three of the five independents to make me Speaker. [Applause.] As a matter of fact I got four of them, in addition to all the Democrats. I think I owe it to the House to say these things I have said. Surely others should be just enough to repeat them by telling the truth. If they want to pound anybody, let them pound the people that ought to be pounded and let us alone. [Applause.]

This has been a very illuminating debate on this bill. There has been no rhetoric or skyscraping oratory, but I sat here all day yesterday and listened to the debate, and it was exceedingly illuminating.

I am going to clear up two or three misapprehensions that some gentlemen entertain. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who is a very active, energetic, and able man, expressed the fear yesterday that these foreign nations would repudiate these loans we are making when some new government came in. There is not a particle of danger of that, not a bit in the world. No great nation in the history of mankind ever repudiated its public debt so far as outsiders are concerned.

I will give you a sample. From 1789 until 1871 the French Government underwent these various changes. In 1789 they had a Bourbon king; they chopped his head off and established a committee of public safety. They got tired of that and drove them out, or put the snuffers on them, and established a directory.

It was so feeble that Napoleon came in and established a consulate first and then the Empire. Then the Bourbons came back and held on until 1830, after Napoleon was sent to St. Helena. In 1830 Louis Philippe was made King of the French—not of France, but of the French. He held on for 18 years until they ran him out in 1848 and established a second Republic that lasted three years. Then Louis Napoleon became Emperor and was Emperor for 18 years. Then for a very short time they had a government by the Commune, and in a short time they established the third French Republic, which seems to be founded on a rock. [Applause.]

France went through all these changes, and yet they never repudiated a single dollar of the public debt of France created by any of these varieties of government. [Applause.] I ought to state frankly that during the French Revolution they issued so many assignats that they went down almost to zero. They were held by the French people and not at large by the world. They took them up and issued new assignats and cut down the volume by two-thirds, basing the new ones on land securities, land which they took away from the Catholic Church during the Revolution. There is no doubt in the world that even if the Czar should be restored to-morrow, out of respect for the opinion of mankind—for that is what does it—he would recognize these debts made by Kerensky and the rest of the revolutionists.

I desire to clear up these outside matters first. The other day I said in interrogating my friend from Michigan [Mr. FOMMER] that since this Government was founded there have been but two years when we did not have a national debt. As a matter of fact, during those two years we did have a national debt of $7,000, because they never could find the people who held the bonds. We started in with a national debt, which was created by the Revolutionary War. It was increased by Hamilton's assumption act, which assumed the revolutionary debts of the various States. Mr. Speaker CANNON intervened to make it appear I was mistaken about what I was talking about, which I was not. These two years were in John Tyler's administration. Mr. Speaker CANNON said truly that a surplus was accumulated in Andrew Jackson's administration. That is the truth, but at the same time a national debt was running. Certain bonds had not matured and were outstanding, and you can not send out for a man who has a national bond that is due five years from now and say to him that he has to take the money for the bond at this time. You can not do that. While they had a surplus, they also had a national debt.

Mr. CANNON. How much?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The lowest that I could ever find it got to was $7,000, in Tyler's day. The surplus was accumulated in Jackson's day. Here is what they undertook to do, and it is one of the most ridiculous things that was ever done since the world began, bar none. They passed a law to deposit with the States the surplus that the United States Government had above what was necessary for the running expenses of the Government and what was necessary to pay the interest upon the bonds that were not due. That law provided for a deposit of the surplus in four payments. Col. Benton fought the thing tooth and nail, and he said he was awfully sorry that they ever persuaded Gen. Jackson to sign the bill. A panic came along in 1837. This deposit bill was passed in Jackson's day. Col. Benton says:

The deposit with the States had only reached its second installment—

They just parceled it out per capita—when the deposit banks, unable to stand a continued quarterly drain of near ten millions to the quarter, gave up the effort and closed their doors. The first installment had been delivered the 1st of January, in specie or its equivalent; the second in April, also in valid money; the third one, demandable on the 1st of June, was accepted by the States in depreciated paper; and they were very willing to receive the fourth installment in the same way. It had cost the States nothing, was not likely to be called back by the Federal Government, and was all clear gains to those who took it as a deposit and held it as a donation. But the Federal Treasury needed it also; and likewise needed ten millions more of that amount which had already been "deposited" with the States; and which "deposit" was made and accepted under a statute which required it to be paid back whenever the wants of the Treasury required it. That want had now come, and the event showed the delusion and the cheat of the bill under which a distribution had been made in the name of a deposit. The idea of restitution entered no one's head; neither of the Government to demand it, nor of the States to render back. What had been delivered was gone. That was a clear case, and that reclamation or rendition even of the smallest part or at the most remote period was not dreamed of.

I desire to be absolutely fair about this debt business. In the statistical abstract the statement is made that from 1840 to 1850 the interest upon the public debt amounted to $174,598. The reason for that was that by the time they got through paying off the old debt we got into a war with Mexico and created another debt, and that is where most of the $174,598 went. During one year in Tyler's administration the per capita tax for the national debt went down to 1 cent, and that is how near they came to wiping it out.

Yesterday I interrogated my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who is a hard-working, industrious, intelligent, capable statesman. By way of a question, I asserted that if we issued too many bonds and did not pay enough of this war debt as it goes along the United States bonds would go below par, and I am certain of that as I am of the fact that I am standing here. Surely no right-thinking man wants to see our national obligations hawked around below par. Our credit is higher to-day than that of any other nation on earth, and we desire to keep it so. And let it never be forgotten that no matter how much our bonds go below par we must finally pay them at their face value. I am in favor of a sort of fifty-fifty arrangement. I would not absolutely say fifty-fifty, but somewhere in that neighborhood—50 per cent of taxes and 50 per cent of bonds. I am opposed to loading this war debt onto succeeding generations. [Applause.] This generation entered into this war and this generation ought to pay its war debts. [Applause.] I do not want my children and my grandchildren and my great grandchildren, and yours and everyone's else, to be loaded up with paying a debt that we created by this war with Germany. They will have their own wars to fight and their own war debts to pay.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that with the vast expense incurred in the conduct of the war, vaster than has ever been incurred in any activity in all the history of the world, it would be possible to maintain the commercial equilibrium of the United States if 50 per cent of the expenses that we are incurring were collected in direct taxation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no sort of doubt about it.

Mr. MADDEN. There would not be any business left inside of 30 days.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why?

Mr. MADDEN. Because you would take away all of the accumulations of every business activity.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let us see about that. The wealth of this country is estimated at $200,000,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is in railroad ties and other nonliquid property, which you can not quickly convert into money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It does not make any difference what it is in. The wealth of this country is estimated conservatively at $200,000,000,000, and the highest tax that has been proposed by anyone would not be outrageous. I do not want to burden the people of this generation with an amount of tax that would be cruel or unreasonable or that would stop the business of the country. I want to be absolutely just and fair to everybody. Nobody with brains in his head desires to injure, cripple, or destroy any legitimate business in this country; but surely it is not cruel or outrageous to conscript great wealth at the same time we are conscripting our young men.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman would not propose, however, to take 50 per cent taxes for the purpose of taking care of the bonds issued for the money that we are to loan to foreign countries?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would count that out, and that is the reason I asked the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] for information yesterday—and I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] answered the question—as to whether in issuing these bonds there is a difference made between the bonds we are issuing for money that we are to spend ourselves for ourselves and the bonds issued for money that we are to loan these foreign countries. The foreign countries to whom we issue bonds are to pay the interest on the bonds loaned to them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Speaker allow me to ask another question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the Speaker will admit that it would not be possible to collect a very great proportion of the $200,000,000,000 this country is worth in cash at any collection day, and I presume the Speaker would also be willing to admit that the wealth of the country is the genius of the country and the labor of the country, and the liquid assets of the country are the result of the toil of the people of the country and not the wealth of the country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course all wealth is created by labor; that is axiomatic. Nobody proposes to take all the $200,000,000 on any collection day, but it is proposed to take enough to prevent bonds going below par, for at last we must pay them at par.

Mr. GARNER. May I call the Speaker's attention to the fact that the revenue bill we passed here was based upon that idea of 50-50, and at that time it was estimated to cost $3,800,000,000? Since that time it has gone up to something over $9,000,000,000 for necessary expenses of this Government alone.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Two billion dollars a year on a valuation of $200,000,000,000 is not excessive, surely. Three billion dollars a year would not be, but the men of this generation who are not going into the Army ought to be willing to pay their full part of the expenses. [Applause.] If the young men of this country are willing to risk their lives on the battle field, then our people who would stay at home, like us and everybody else, ought to be willing to contribute their dollars. [Applause.]

I am in favor of paying as much of this as we can possibly do without what appears to be extortion and cruelty; but when these young men come back from the war—those of them who do come back—they should not be compelled to pay the war debt themselves. [Applause.] I do not believe it is fair. I think men ought to be willing to risk a dollar as easily as another man his life. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. The Speaker must admit that a great many of the men who go to the front to fight the battles are paying taxes also. It is not merely the poor men, but every man is going to the front who is called, rich or poor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have heard that a great many are trying to get out or keep out of the war.

Mr. KNUTSON. When the war resolution was up, if I remember rightly, the gentleman from Illinois stated upon the floor of this House that he would probably be called upon to pay as much taxes as any man, and that he would do it without a whimper.

Mr. MADDEN. So I will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no doubt the gentleman will contribute his part.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say to the Speaker, he knows as well as I do that under existing laws and the proposed new revenue bill now before the Senate, if it is enacted into law as it is now prepared, it will tax the people within the next 12 months $4,000,000,000 of direct taxes. Does the Speaker know of any great country in the world, of any important people in the world, in a long and expensive war, that ever paid 50 per cent in direct taxes and borrowed only one-half from loans?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know; I have not investigated that.

Mr. FORDNEY. If so, I would like to know it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell the gentleman what I do know—that the British Government is taking 80 per cent excess profits during this war; and if that is a good thing for them, and we seem to be copying them a good deal, why can not we do it here?

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest to the Speaker that England financed more than four-fifths of her war expenses by bond issues?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all right. I would not object to financing four-fifths of this war by direct taxation, if we can get it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; it is just the reverse. England is financing more than four-fifths of all her war expenses by bonds and less than one-fifth by taxes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you what I am willing to do. I am willing to bet the best hat Stetson can make that not a single one of those English bonds will ever sell for par while the world lasts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Nevertheless England is financing the war in that way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They financed the Napoleonic war, too—

Mr. FORDNEY. But the English bonds are now being sold to us at par.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, sold to us at par. [Applause.] They are not being sold to anybody else at par. [Applause.] Now, I want to state a curious fact and it is of exceeding interest. Gentlemen of this House will all agree that one of the greatest men who ever lived in the world was Napoleon. He carried on all of his wars with all of Europe and never left the French nation any considerable war debt. He paid as he went, and of course some of it he stole from other nations [laughter], but that was a very inconsiderable portion of it. Well, now, nobody, of course, supposes that Congress is going to pull back for an instant on voting all the money and all the men that are necessary to carry this war to a successful and I hope a speedy conclusion. [Applause.] That can not be stated too often. Here is my suggestion. If we issue more bonds than we ought to issue in proportion to the taxes levied, the speculators and the money gamblers are just as certain to put them below par as the sun is to rise to-morrow morning. [Applause.] No good, patriotic American wants to see that come to pass, for it can not be stated too often that at last we must pay all these bonds at par.

The other day my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said that the Government had never sold a bond below par. I want to read him a few figures.

Some of the great banks in New York send out literature, and some of it is very valuable, too. The National Bank of Commerce issued this pamphlet which I hold in my hand, and if I was going to make a speech sure enough I would take these sentences from the Secretary of the Treasury as a text. He says:

The greatest immediate service the American people can render in this war for universal liberty throughout the world is to furnish the means for its vigorous prosecution. This bond issue—is the first step. I earnestly bespeak the cooperation of every citizen throughout the length and breadth of our land in this service of patriotism.

That is, the first one—

That is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, D. C., May 2, 1917.

There was never a truer statement made. The response that the American people made to that appeal was magnificent. They not only took all those bonds but oversubscribed them very largely.

Here is what happened during the Civil War, and substantially the same thing happened in the War of 1812 and to a certain extent in the War of the Revolution and to a small extent in the Mexican War. Secretary Chase undertook, with great misgivings, as he himself said, to finance the Civil War by the issue of bonds. The first thing he did was to raise the customs duties, the tariff, sufficient to get money enough to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government—the internal-revenue system had not been put into effect then—the interest on the bond issue, and to set aside $5,000,000 a year for the sinking fund. Of course, that sinking fund was insignificant and ridiculous. The bonds commenced going down. Here is the history of it. It is rather dry, but I do not know anything of more intense interest.

For the quarter ending March 31, 1862, the gross amount of bonds issued was $60,947,202.67. That was the amount of bonds issued. Here is what they got out of them, namely $59,527,132.84. The percentage of money which the Government got for that issue of bonds was 97.67 of the face value of the bonds.

For the quarter ending June 30, 1862, they issued $209,049,203.81 and received for it in gold—all these are in gold here—$200,230,763.59. That is, they sold $9,000,000 below par. The rate that the Government received on that issue was 95.78.

For the quarter ending September 30, 1862, they issued $68,934,420.36, and realized $59,000,000, a loss of about $9,000,000, namely, $59,648,953.94; the percentage that the Government got was 86.54.

Mr. HASTINGS. At what rate was the interest on those bonds?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Some of them bore 7 per cent, and I think one bore  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and then some of them bore 6. None of them ever got below 5 per cent during the war, and I am not certain that they got down to that. If I had time, I could give all the figures about it.

For the quarter ending December 31, 1862, the Government sold $131,631,479.40 and realized $101,250,933.95, a loss of $30,000,000 on that issue, and the per cent that the Government realized was 76.92.

For the batch of bonds issued March 31, 1863, $178,569,759.25, they realized only $115,195,351.69, the rate being 64.51 per cent. I take it that the Union armies had gained some victories about that time or they would not have gone up 3 per cent. It was according to who was winning and who was losing. If they had sold bonds when Jubal Early was out here at Silver Spring, they would not have brought 25 cents on the dollar.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Is it not true that they could not sell these bonds at all until Robert J. Walker went to London about the second year of the war?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They used every kind of means in the world. They sent Walker to Europe, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said Jay Cooke took hold of it. He seemed to be a great financial genius. I repeat, that if they had undertaken to negotiate bonds when Jubal Early was out here at Silver Spring, the gamblers in New York would have bought those bonds down at as low as 25 cents on the dollar, when anybody who had any sense knew that Early's invasion of the Capital was not very dangerous. Nevertheless, it would have served the purposes of the speculators and gamblers.

The bonds issued for the quarter ending June 30, 1863, amounted to $216,460,067.49. For those bonds they received only $145,829,147.47, and the rate was 67.37.

The bond issue for the quarter ending September 30, 1863, was $118,267,491.75, and for them they realized $89,000,000 as against $118,000,000. The amount was $89,800,506.48, the rate being 75.93.

Now, you will observe the difference. The other rate was 67.37, and then they went up to 75.93 because of the Battle of Gettysburg and because Grant at that time captured Vicksburg. The batch of bonds issued December 31, 1863, amounted to $150,450,843.85.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me finish this one sentence. They sold for $100,862,245.72 and dropped back to the percentage of 67.40.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Speaker a question. I notice that in reading those figures it appears the Speaker has said that the amount of bonds offered or sold ran up to so many millions and so many odd dollars and cents. Now the bonds are in dollars. The bonds did not on the face contain any cents.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but they bid on them any way they pleased.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That would be the amount that the Government would receive, not the amount of the bonds offered in cents. The aggregate would be in even dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is not the way these Treasury officials keep the books.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It may have been the bonds and accumulated interest.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Probably it was. These figures that I am reading are Treasury figures, taken from the books of the Treasury. I am going to make a whole job of it if they do not call time on me. The thing that evidently caused the drop back from 67 to 65 was that they did not use up Lee as completely as they thought they had, and he went on fighting, and that made these people uneasy again.

Now, the batch of bonds that was issued in the quarter ending March 31, 1864—$191,922,104.42—realized $120,220,006.20, and dropped to 62.64. There were more Confederate victories somewhere.

On the batch of bonds issued for the quarter ending June 30, 1864—$235,371,791.92—the Treasury realized only $122,581,629.23, the rate realized being 52.08 per cent. The reason for that was the way that Lee's army was fighting in the Wilderness, and people commenced coming to the conclusion that they never could put down the Confederacy.

On the batch of bonds issued in the quarter ending September 30, 1864—one hundred and forty-seven billion—no, millions; I am so much in the habit of thinking in billions that I made the slip—on this batch of $147,735,822.22 they realized $61,295,592.72, the rate of percentage realized being 41.49.

On the batch of bonds issued December 31, 1864—$179,908,674.29—they realized $80,365,204.80, and the rate of 44.67. That is the percentage.

On March 31, 1865, when the war was practically over, they issued $175,313,376.72, and out of that one hundred and seventy-five million and odd dollars they realized $88,094,971.80, at the percentage of 50.25. Of course everybody that had any sense knew that the war was about over. The cause of the Union was going up.

In the batch issued June 30, 1865, they issued $361,905,625.74, and realized out of the three hundred and sixty-one million and odd dollars $253,406,319.14, and the percentage was 70.2. That was because the war was over.

On the batch issued September 30, 1865—$138,765,727.22—they realized $97,038,873.04, the percentage of realization being 89.93.

Now here is a summary of all that.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Speaker a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Were all these bonds payable in gold? That is, did they all get the gold?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. That is what they got. As a matter of fact, I was not able to find it since the bill came up, but I have read it somewhere in a reliable authority that one day during the Civil War bonds went down to 40 cents on the dollar.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the Speaker think that the financial situation during the Civil War period was so entirely different from the present financial situation that these figures are not strictly applicable to and significant of our condition? At that time the country was split in two, and the bonds were payable in gold. We were on a paper-money basis and did not have the gold to pay the men. The situation was different.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the gentleman's remarks are entirely pertinent.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The purchasers of those bonds could pay for them in greenbacks, a depreciated currency?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is exactly what they did do.

Mr. McKENZIE. And when the war was over they got 100 per cent on the bonds?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. They got 100 per cent on the bonds that brought 40 or anything else. Now, to answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] first, I have not the slightest idea that, no difference how many bonds we issue in this war, they will ever depreciate like those Civil War bonds; but that they will depreciate, if you issue too many of them, is as certain as the day of judgment is to come. In 1861 the taxable wealth of the United States was only $16,000,000,000. That was all. Think of that! Now the taxable wealth of the United States, as I said before, is over $200,000,000,000. During the Civil War 11 of the States were out, and it was not dead certain we would ever get them back, and of course nobody who had any sense believed that the Republic of the United States was going to be destroyed. What men feared was that it would be split in two—that there would be two republics instead of one.

Now, here is the summary: It is easy to remember. It takes it up by years. For the year ending December 31, 1862, the bonds issued amounted to $460,562,806.28. Out of that year they realized $420,657,784.32, and the percentage was 89.

I will put the whole table in the Record.

Table showing Treasury receipts from public obligations of all sorts for each quarter during the war, and the gold value of such receipts, estimated on the average price of gold for each quarter.

Secretary Chase was compelled to change his method of procedure. He found that the bonds would depreciate. First he issued a great quantity of Treasury notes, or greenbacks. It does not make any difference what you call them; they are all the same. We have $346,000,000 outstanding now of that old greenback debt, except what has been destroyed in one way or another.

He came to the conclusion that he could not raise the tariff any higher for the purpose of increasing the revenue—that he had got it as high as it would stand—so he devised this internal-revenue scheme. They had not had any internal-revenue tax for a long time. They had a civil war away back in John Adams's day about laying an internal-revenue tax, and Gen. Alexander Hamilton went away with his army down into western Pennsylvania to the seat of the trouble. That was then the great whisky district. It has been transferred now to Kentucky and Illinois, and is about to go out altogether. Anyhow, they resisted the internal-revenue tax so much in Pennsylvania that Gen. Hamilton went down there with his troops to put down the rebellion, and, of course, when he got there he found nobody in rebellion, for they had all gone into their holes.

On the 4th of July, 1862, Secretary Chase got this internal-revenue system started that we now have. The chief feature of it was a $2-a-gallon tax on whisky. The only mistake they made was in not putting a tax on the whisky already in existence as well as that which they were going to make thereafter. That was the mistake, too, in the bill that we passed here not long ago. The first year after they got that thing into full operation the Government took in $311,000,000 from the internal-revenue system. That commenced to put our financial affairs on a stable basis.

Now, to sum up everything that I have said here, I am in favor of something in the neighborhood of 50-50—

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the Speaker that all the taxes possible should be levied at this time to raise revenue to run this war. What I mean by "all the taxes possible" is all that we are able to raise without destroying the tax-producing power of the Government.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the gentleman is entirely correct. Nobody wants to destroy the tax-producing power of the Government.

Mr. GARNER. Now, in that connection, during the Civil War evidently unlimited power was given to the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the method which he should employ and the price that he should obtain for the bonds. In this bill and the bill that we passed the last time there are three essential features in which Congress limits the Secretary of the Treasury. First, in the rate of interest. That probably was done in the Civil War; second, you can not sell these bonds for less than par; and third, in this bill, that the bonds are subject to certain taxes. Now, as long as we hold these features in our bill, certainly we will never be put in the position that they were in the Civil War, and we will never have to sacrifice our bonds as they did then.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman's question first. The provision that the bonds shall not be sold below par is beautiful in theory, but just the very minute that these moneyed men conclude that par is not an exactly safe price, they will refuse to buy the bonds.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides in the taxing feature so that rich men can not buy these bonds. These bonds must be sold to the masses of the people of this country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose the masses of the people will not buy a 4 per cent bond?

Mr. GARNER. You will have to make such an inducement that they will buy it; but the taxing feature of this bond prohibits a man with an income of over $30,000 a year buying it if he has the nontaxable bonds at 3½ per cent. I would rather have a million dollars' worth of 3½ per cent nontaxable bonds than to have a million dollars' worth of these bonds at 4 per cent, taxable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That may be, but here is the difficulty: The gentleman has stated the law correctly, but if people conclude that this war debt is going to be piled up so high that it is not going to be paid within any reasonable time they will not buy the bonds.

Mr. GARNER. Then we have got to confiscate wealth.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have not got any power on the face of the earth to go into a man's pocket and take a thousand dollars out of it, or any other sum out of it, and make him invest it in bonds. You can levy taxes ad libitum, if you choose, but you can not force a man to invest his money in bonds or in any other way.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. In support of your contention for a half-and-half levy—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Somewhere in that neighborhood. Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Do you believe that if the receipts of the Treasury in 1861 had been what they were in 1864, our money ever would have gone below par?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I believe it would not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Gold would never have gone out of circulation, and our bonds would never have been sold below par.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is exactly true. If they had had that $311,000,000 of internal revenue in 1861 the bonds of the Government would never have gone much below par. They might have gone down a little, according to the victories on one side or the other, and the greenbacks would have stayed with the bonds, because they always did.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the Speaker permit me there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If we had had then what we have now, adopted by the Republican Party, a gold standard, that has made all money worth 100 cents on the dollar, there would have been less depreciation of our money then.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They had a gold standard then.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; they did not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These very estimates were made in gold.

Mr. FORDNEY. I beg to differ. Our greenbacks were not redeemable in gold then.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These estimates I have been reading here are gold estimates.

Mr. FORDNEY. They were redeemable in some kind of money but not in gold as they are to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They were redeemable in coin.

Mr. FORDNEY. But not in gold coin.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but these estimates that I have given here are gold estimates.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, greenbacks came into existence as a result of the Civil War finance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Kentucky states it exactly right. Greenbacks came into existence as a necessity of the Civil War finance. I have not the time to talk about it; but Secretary Chase issued the greenbacks, made them legal tender, and then when he got on the Supreme Court bench he said they were not legal tender and very frankly stated that he made a mistake during the Civil War.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. As a matter of fact, silver went out of circulation as well as gold. It was not a question of gold or silver but it was a question of any kind of money.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, for I have great confidence in his knowledge and information, with regard to the proposition that the war should be financed on a fifty-fifty basis. I think it is evident and I say it subject to correction, that our expenses for this year will be in the neighborhood of $14,000,000,000, exclusive of the $7,000,000,000 to be loaned to the allies. Under these circumstances we would have to raise this year $7,000,000,000 by taxation. In other words, we would have to add more than $5,000,000,000 to the revenue bill that recently passed this House.

Now, I want to premise my question by this assertion, which I think is correct. Even if we did conscript the income above $100,000, and even though we did put a tax of 80 per cent as the Speaker suggested on the war profits, we would still have several million dollars to raise by taxation this year. Now, I want to ask the Speaker how he would suggest that we could get these additional taxes, and whether he would suggest it be done by the imposition of customs duties or consumption taxes, or both.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As a rule I am against consumption taxes, and as a rule I am opposed to raising the tariff. [Laughter and applause.] That has been stated often enough so that everybody knows it. But rather than issue an unduly large proportion of bonds and pile them up on my children and my children's children, I would agree to vote with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to increase the tariff if necessary [applause], praying all the time that God would forgive me. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman submit to a suggestion?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. On this question of the amount of revenue which may be raised, I would like to call the Speaker's attention to the fact that it is estimated that war profits for this year alone will equal at least $4,000,000,000, and an 80 per cent tax on that would net at least $3,200,000,000. That that estimate is not exaggerated is evidenced by the fact that the war profits for the Steel Trust alone this year will amount to $490,000,000, as against an average prior to the war of $63,000,000. So if the Speaker will even take the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio and tax incomes and excess profits we can raise the $7,000,000,000 without oppressing anyone. The income of this country is estimated by the best authorities to be something like $45,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's figures do not agree with those submitted by the Finance Committee of the Senate; very far from it.

Mr. KEATING. They do; my figures as to the Steel Trust are taken from the speech of Senator SIMMONS, chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate, made the other day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The proposition which was voted down of putting a tax of 80 per cent on excess profits was not estimated to raise more than $2,000,000,000.

Mr. KEATING. How can that be when the war profits amount to $4,000,000,000?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to put in a saving clause about raising the tariff. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that it would be a temporary raise like Gov. Dingley raised it in the Spanish War.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri, and was about to say when I was interrupted, that if I were the Good Lord, and the gentleman from Missouri would vote with me on the tariff, I would give him a clear slate. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no doubt of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to ask the Speaker if it ought not to be stated here that the reason that the greenbacks went down so much below par was that Secretary Chase's first plan was that anyone who had a greenback could buy a 6 per cent gold bond, known as a 5-20 bond, at par, and the people were afraid they were paying too much interest and repealed that provision, and thereupon the greenbacks fell?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suppose that is about correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, as to the profits of the Steel Trust during this year, actual and prospective, basing earnings of the last two quarters on the earnings of the first two quarters, I find it stated by a Republican of prominence, and also by a Democrat of great prominence in another body, to which I do not dare refer, in a debate yesterday that the profits of the Steel Trust instead of being $490,000,000—that being the amount upon which the estimate of the Finance Committee of the other distinguished body to which I do not refer was made—will be $570,000,000. The $490,000,000 represents the net profits after making the deduction.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman from Missouri stated that the provision of the bill stating that the bonds should not be sold below par was good in theory, but not in practice.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: If the alternative is given to the wealth of America to either finance this war by buying the bonds at par or submitting to direct taxation, are they not likely to buy the bonds at par?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am rather inclined to think they would buy the bonds at par, but here is what happened up in New York City the other day. It has happened twice since we issued these 3½ per cent bonds. A lot of fellows undertook to pound them down. How many were engaged in the unpatriotic operation I do not know, but one day they got the bonds, the three and a half, down to 99.20, and the other day, I think, they got them down to 99.32. There is no question in the world but that it was an effort to discount the 3½ per cent bonds in order to get 4 per cent bonds.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. POUL. I desire to ask the gentleman his opinion upon this question. With respect to the issue of bonds provided by this bill there are these conditions. They must not be sold under par, they carry a rate of 4 per cent interest and are subject to a surtax, and according to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] the purchasers must be limited to people whose incomes are under $30,000 a year.

Mr. GARNER. Based upon the present surtax proposed in the present revenue bill, a man who has an income of more than $30,000 would prefer a 3½ per cent tax-free bond to the 4 per cent provided in this bill.

Mr. POUL. As a practical proposition does the gentleman think the country would absorb such a large issue of bonds at par?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I doubt whether it would with all those conditions attached.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman has called attention to one of the evils that always arises where there are successive issues of bonds during a war. He refers to the hammering down of the price with a view of getting higher rates of interest and getting conversion privileges into higher rates of interest. I have noticed one country adopted an expedient about seven months ago which absolutely prevented all artificial fluctuation through the efforts of individuals or groups of individuals.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And I think the chances are that we will do it, if this war goes on long enough.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I was about to say that it had not cost them anything, either. They simply provide that a small percentage of the bond issue shall constitute a sinking fund, and that whenever any bondholder becomes dissatisfied with his bond he can have it redeemed at the issue price. There have been very few redemptions and no artificial fluctuations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman there permit one statement, so that it can be made clear in respect to these profits?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Wall Street Journal of August 2, 1917, in commenting upon the earnings of the Steel Trust this year, deducts from $490,000,000 the amount of taxes, etc. This is the language of the Wall Street Journal of August 2:

The allowance of $53,918,872 for war income and excess-profits taxes made by United States Steel in the second quarter is much larger than recent Wall Street estimates, but this is due largely to the fact that earnings, not deducting taxes, in the second quarter were at the rate of nearly $578,000,000 annually, and earnings to which the tax is applicable were at the rate of $490,000,000 annually.

It now appears that, after making the deduction, $490,000,000 is the amount of net profits.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. To sum up these remarks, I desire to state that I am in favor of paying this war debt on a fifty-fifty basis, in bonds and taxes, or something approximating that, as we go. If we issue more bonds, proportionately, than we levy taxes, the bonds are going to depreciate. If the bonds depreciate, the rate of interest in new issues will have to be increased, and if these young men are willing to go and do the fighting the rest of the American people who stay at home ought to be willing to pay this war debt. [Applause.] If I had my way about it, I would make all of these bonds serial. I am in favor of the surtax on the 4 per cents. Whether it would be wise to commence paying them earlier than 10 years from issue I do not undertake to say, but they ought to be made serial bonds, so that the debt will gradually disappear; and I want to repeat it, so that everyone in the country who reads this speech will know it, that Congress is willing to vote every dollar and every man necessary to carry this war to a successful conclusion, as speedily as possible, and that there are no lines of political demarcation in that conclusion. Americans, having put their hands to the plow, will not look back. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope gentlemen who desire to speak will wait until we get through with the consideration of this bill. How many gentlemen will likely desire to make speeches respecting the remarks and suggestions of the Speaker?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know of any speeches except under the five-minute rule. I understood in the beginning that the debate on this bill was to be confined to the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then I do not know of any speeches on this side.

Mr. KITCHIN. I meant confined to the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am in thorough accord with the main proposals just laid down by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] On April 13, 11 days after this Congress had met and 7 after war was declared, I took occasion in connection with the then bond-issue bill to call attention to the history of the financing of the Civil War and the fatal mistake that was made in failing to tax until that war had progressed nearly three years the people of America a sufficient amount, and I warned the Congress and the country that no more fatal mistake could be made than too lightly to tax the people of America, and that that mistake would result not only in lessening the credit of the country in the flotation of bonds, but it would create an equal evil. Nothing so serves to inflate prices, nothing so serves to increase the cost to the Government of getting things done than the issue of large credits by the Government and not accompanying them by heavy taxes. [Applause.] The result is always inflation; the result is always to engender increased individual activities. In a time like this there is no more vicious cry than that of "Business as usual." Business as usual can not be if the Government's business is to be done, because the Government's business is a demand upon the material resources of the country so tremendous that it can only be supplied by curtailing the activities of private business along lines that are not essential to the country. One of the surest ways of curtailing such unnecessary activities is by heavy taxation.

Now, I am not prepared to announce any flat proposals of percentages, but there is no danger of the Congress erring by taxing too heavily. The danger is going to be the other way and one of the things that we must do is to see to it that we do tax, as heavily as they can bear, the profits that grow out of the war [applause] and then the men who applaud that, and I believe in their sincerity, must also have the courage to tax the great mass of the people also [applause], not as heavily, of course, but when you come to income taxes you are going to see the day, and it is not far distant, when the rate of taxation on incomes of $7,500 up to $15,000 or $20,000, is going to be much higher than the rate that is now proposed as to such incomes in either the revenue bill as it passed the House or as now pending in the Senate. You can get a certain amount of money and ought to get it from certain great reservoirs of wealth, the great trusts of America, but in addition to that you have got to tax the average man of this country and you have got to tax him heavily before he is going to realize that we are engaged in a war of anything like the magnitude of the struggle we are engaged in. Now, I do not agree with a good many statements that have been made here as to the cost of the war. I hope when the deficiency appropriation bill comes forward to be able somewhat in detail to state to the House what I think will be the necessary expenditures of the Government, exclusive of its loans to foreign Governments, for a year of the war. I think it is likely to approximate something like $12,000,000,000. I do not think it ought to go to $14,000,000,000, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. We now propose under existing law and the proposed taxation in the pending revenue bill to get something like, I think, $3,000,000,000 in round numbers, in addition to revenues of about one billion for ordinary expenditures. On the assumption of $11,000,000,000 of war expenditures that would represent something like 27 per cent. That ought to be certainly the minimum of the proportion that the taxation bears to bond issue and I believe that it is desirable to increase the percentage considerably above 27 per cent. I am glad that the Speaker should have made his speech to-day. I do not desire to destroy the business of America. I realize that you can not cripple it and at the same time get continued revenues from it—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for two minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky have 10 minutes in which to finish.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not use all of that time. I am very much obliged to the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. I believe that the sound judgment of the best financial thought of America is in favor of sufficient taxation to put a restraining hand upon expansion and inflation in America, and I have no doubt of the patriotism of the people of America and their willingness to bear the burden. There is no more cowardly place on earth than the Congress of the United States, and that is not because of the personnel of the men who make up the Congress, but it is because that here of necessity we hear the protests of many individuals, and hearing individual protests we are apt to consider that those individuals constitute the great mass of the people. I never go back to my constituency or mingle with the body of the people generally without gaining new courage touching their patriotism and their willingness to sacrifice [applause], and if this Congress will simply follow what is not theory, for if anything on earth has been demonstrated over and over again it is the basic principles of finance, both of nations and of individuals, if it simply follows those basic principles, realizing that no nation, no matter what its credit is, can continue to promise to pay without taking the steps necessary to pay and maintain its credit, we will not have any trouble in financing this war. We are dealing in gigantic figures, but the wealth of America is gigantic. The creative power of men to-day measured in dollars is superior to what it was in former periods, particularly during the time of the Civil War. All the bonded indebtedness that has been proposed will not begin to put the strain upon the real resources of America that was placed upon the resources of America at the time of the Civil War. But we must see to it that as we go forward we take those steps that give an earnest of our willingness to pay a large proportion of the expenses out of taxation now and to provide for protection of the interest and early redemption of the principal of the bonds that we issue. It would amount to a monstrous crime, and it would not be really in the interest of the people of to-day if we undertook to shoulder this cost onto succeeding generations. We can not do it successfully, and to attempt to do it would simply mean financial ruin and destruction of the credit of the greatest financial Nation on earth. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 7. That none of the bonds authorized by section 1, nor of the certificates authorized by section 5, or by section 6, of this act, shall bear the circulation privilege. All such bonds and certificates shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits or war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, after the word "corporation," line 14, add the words "owning more than $10,000 of the securities mentioned in this section."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I called attention to section 7 when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was making his remarks a day or two ago, and I gave notice that I would offer an amendment to it.

Now, I want the committee to understand what the proposition is and what the amendment does. In order to do that intelligently, however, I want to state that the $2,000,000,000 of bonds that have been placed upon the market are subject only to taxation known as inheritance tax. They are not subject to any excess-profits taxes, or any war taxes, or any other taxes, either State or National. They went upon the market at 3½ per cent interest. This bill proposes, if it is enacted as it stands, to repeal that law so far as future issues are concerned, under the law of April last, and in lieu thereof to issue bonds provided for in the bill, and additional bonds.

Now, judging from the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, judging from the speeches that have been made, and from the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, and what is in the air besides, we are going a long way to prevent any plutocrat, anybody that has a large income, from getting any of these bonds. We want to make it a popular loan. We want people that have a dollar or a half a dollar, or any other sum, from a patriotic standpoint, and at the rate of interest, which we say is 4 per cent, to take these bonds. We want to make it a popular loan, and we want to bar out people who are making large incomes from business or otherwise from having any of these bonds. Well, can we do it? I have no objection if it is possible to do it. Lord bless my soul, if every man at the head of every family, every adult male or female, grown individuals, would come in and take $5, or $10, or $15, or $20, I would be delighted. The only question is whether they will do it under the provisions of this bill. In my judgment they will not, and if you will bear with me a very few minutes I will try to say why.

The latter part of this section of the bill, after exempting from inheritance taxes, has the following:

(b) Graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits or war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States upon the incomes or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations.

That means all of them. If this works out we are going to include all the people, patriotic and selfish as well, because the two go together after all is said and done in matters of taxation, and we are going to have them take these bonds. Is it possible under this bill? I do not believe it is. Can you prove it? I have in my hand here a statement from a loan official that there were 4,500,000 subscriptions. Now, then, by those subscribers that took those bonds, the 4,500,000, there were a great many $10 subscriptions. And all over the country there are those $10 certificates. And then, again, people of small means took them. A number of clerks here that can barely live on $900 or $1,000 or $1,200 took a $100 bond.

They have got time on it; they are to pay so much a month. They went to the bank, savings bank or otherwise, and borrowed the money to do it. It will take some time to pay it out. I am glad that they did. And now throughout the length and breadth of the country you have these 4,500,000 people subscribing to this loan.

But they did not subscribe enough. Bonds in amount $10,000 and under yielded $1,291,500,000, and that left unsubscribed $703,500,000. That latter amount was subscribed by people who took more than $10,000 each.

Now, those who took $10,000 and less got those bids accepted in full. Those that subscribed more, however, few in number as compared with those that I have just referred to, got 60 per cent of their subscriptions, and there you are.

Now, what does this do? It subjects these bonds that are issued under this bill—and I call your attention again to it—to future legislation. This legislation renders them subject not only to excess-profits taxes and inheritance taxes, as provided by present law, but you can take every cent of it away from them. Now, 4 per cent is paid by savings banks in the main; the great bulk of them pay that much, and that money is nontaxable. How many of these people, when they come to understand it, are going to draw out the from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 now held by them in savings banks under these conditions, where the savings are nontaxable for any purpose whatever, even from State taxation and all taxation?

How many are going to draw out their money from the savings banks and take the risk of the future in surtaxes? "Oh, well, they will not think about that," it may be said. Look here: If this legislation goes through as proposed, we have got to play fair with the people that take $5 and $10 or $100 or $1,000. You may say that the amount of exemption which I propose here—$10,000—from future legislation by the Federal Government is too high. Maybe it is. I do not know. Let us say it is too high; put it at $5,000. But I do not think $10,000 is too high. Ten times 4 is 40, and you make an annual income of $400. If you reduce it to $5,000, it will be an annual income of $200.

After all, will the bonds show any depreciation if the bill passes as it is now proposed? In my judgment, yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does the gentleman, from his long experience, think of the advisability of Congress putting into the law a provision which authorizes States, in their discretion, to levy income taxes against national securities, national bonds—taxation by States?

Mr. CANNON. I understand this does not do that, even as it stands.

Mr. KITCHIN. You are right. States under this can not tax incomes.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it is free from taxation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But it says it shall be imposed by the United States or any State, a graduated additional income tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Graduated additional income tax, commonly called surtax and excess-profits tax and war-profits tax, imposed by the United States.

Mr. CANNON. It is by the United States. There is no doubt about that, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have 5 or 10 minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want much more time. If, however, the House will grant me 10 minutes, I will try to make my meaning clear.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I am going to vote for this bill, whether this amendment is adopted or not. It has got to pass the Senate. I want to be sure, if the bill passes the way it is, that this loan is going to succeed. I want to be fair with the people that we enlist in the cause from a patriotic standpoint—100,000,000 people, the wage earner, the farmer, the savings-bank depositor, and all. I want to be fair with them, and when they get these securities I want them to keep them, because that is a constant reminder that the United States must exist and prosper if, from the selfish standpoint as well as the patriotic standpoint, they receive their interest. It is in the utmost good faith that I offer this amendment. Sometimes gentlemen offer amendments to confuse and try to discredit the bill, and all that kind of thing. I have no such intention here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to be clear as to the practical effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As I understand it, it would mean that the holder of $10,000 worth of these bonds would be exempt from taxation?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the owner of $10,000 or below of these bonds, if this amendment is adopted, will be exempt from all taxation except inheritance taxes. They are already exempt from all State taxation, but I want them to be exempt in the future from all United States taxation except the inheritance tax, and the States may attach an inheritance tax.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But freedom from taxation is not to apply to any holder of bonds in excess of $10,000?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; only to those below $10,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say the exemption is not to apply to any holder in excess of $10,000?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it is not to apply to any holder in excess of $10,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Anyone who holds above that has to pay?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; evidently it is intended to make this a popular loan. It is intended by the bill; it is intended by the policy of the administration. I do not object to it, so far as that is concerned. From the hearings of the Secretary of the Treasury and from the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] we are all agreed that we want to make it a popular loan. I want it to go as a popular loan.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Do I understand that the amendment would not include an exemption of $10,000 for the man who bought $15,000 of the bonds? He would be taxed on the $15,000?

Mr. CANNON. I think the owner of $10,000—

Mr. RUSSELL. Would it not be objectionable on the ground that this would be class legislation if it exempted a man who had $10,000, but did not exempt a man who had more than $10,000?

Mr. CANNON. I am inclined to think that would be the effect of it. I am inclined to think it would be wise.

Mr. RUSSELL. To exempt $10,000 in any man's hands?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should think it ought to be.

Mr. CANNON. The fear is that the men who are wealthy by millions and hundreds of millions will put their money in these bonds for the purpose of avoiding taxation, except inheritance taxes, and therefore we want it to be a popular loan.

Mr. RUSSELL. If it was made to apply to a holder of $10,000 alone, and to no one else, would it not discourage the man who might want to buy $15,000 of bonds, who might confine his purchase to $10,000 when he otherwise would take more?

Mr. CANNON. He would be discouraged right now; and the very effect of the bill is to discourage him—to make this a popular loan. Now, I want to change this bill so that a hundred millions of people may subscribe for it, from \$10 or \$5 up to \$10,000, and so that when they do it will be out of the power of the United States, by future legislation, to tax the aggregate of that holding. I will very frankly say, Is there a man here who would withdraw from a savings bank, where his deposit is not subject to taxation and draws 4 per cent or  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent interest and invest in these bonds? Oh, you may say they would not depreciate. I think many people who subscribe for these bonds would want to pay them out, perhaps, under stress of sickness or emergency—to use them as money—and I apprehend they would depreciate. It is suggested to me that the 7-30 bonds were used as money. Now, that is all I want to say. If the committee thinks we had better make the limit \$5,000 instead of \$10,000 free from taxation, well and good. I want to help, not to scotch or prohibit, if I can.

We have had much talk, as you know, about general taxation. As I am 80 years old, I could a tale unfold about the Civil War financing, and why it was that our currency, redeemable in dollars, was not redeemed. That was one thing; and, then, the doubt as to whether the Union would be preserved, and so on. I do not care to go into that. It is behind us. Thank God, we are together and will remain together, I trust, for thousands of years. [Applause.] And we are with the world that agrees with us, that we have got to win this war.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], for whose opinion I have great respect, said that business must be taxed. Well, I agree that it must be taxed; but what is business? The farmer in the field, the laborer in the shop. It is all of us that make business. I do not want business to decrease. I think the gentleman from Kentucky did not mean what he said. He said he wanted business to be less profitable. I want it to be more profitable, because the more profitable it is in the grand aggregate for 100,000,000 people the more easily we can carry the burden. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure that I understand the proper meaning of the language in section 7, but I shall try to interpret my understanding of it.

Under the language of section 7 of the bill it is proposed that State or inheritance taxes shall apply against the bonds that we are authorizing to be issued. It is proposed that a graduated additional income tax shall be imposed against these bonds; that is, the taxes commonly known as surtaxes and excess-profits or war taxes. Now, I assume that if any individual in the United States should have his whole income derived from the interest on these bonds, and that income was not sufficient to come within the scope of the income against which surtaxes are levied, he would not be compelled to pay any such tax; and I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. KITCHIN] if I am right—if any individual in the United States had an income wholly derived from interest on these bonds proposed to be issued under this law, and that income was not sufficient to come within the scope of the imposition of the surtax, he would not have to pay any taxes, would he?

Mr. KITCHIN. He would not have to pay at all.

Mr. CANNON. He would have to pay if a surtax was levied by subsequent legislation.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. He would not have to pay it under this bill.

Mr. CANNON. No; he would not have to pay under this bill; but this is not the only revenue bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me carry my thought a little further, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is right on this subject. The surtax begins at $5,000, and if that was the amount of interest derived by a holder of bonds he might be the owner of bonds that would be tax free up to the amount of $125,000, if the rate of interest is 4 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; certainly, according to my own reasoning.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, a man worth $125,000 can go free of taxes if, keeping within the normal tax, the interest he received would realize him as high as $5,000.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but the amount subject to normal tax may be reduced by future legislation. It may be reduced to $500.

Mr. MADDEN. The thought I want to convey to the House is that under the provisions of this bill a man may be tax free, so far as the surtax is concerned, if all his income is derived from interest on these bonds; but the same man, for example, may have $10,000 income from a coal mine; he may have a $10,000 annual income from a shoe factory; he may have $10,000 from a steel mill; and his aggregate income may reach $50,000. In that case, if his income reaches the point where he is subject to the surtax on his income from other sources the interest received on the bonds he owns will be added to his income and will take on the rate of taxation under this bill that his total income takes. Now, his total income may be such that it will bear a 50 per cent surtax. If it does, then the interest which he receives on these bonds under such circumstances will be only 2 per cent. So while on the face of his investments he has a 4 per cent bond, as a matter of fact he has only a 2 per cent bond. Now, it is not fair to make one man hold a 4 per cent bond which yields him only 2 per cent and to allow another man to hold a bond of the same issue that yields him 4 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who has carefully gone into the facts and figures on this subject, says that no man with an income of $30,000 a year could afford to buy these 4 per cent bonds, and that it is intended he should not.

Mr. KITCHIN. If you will permit me, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is mistaken about the $30,000.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman from North Carolina say?

Mr. KITCHIN. A man with an income of even $50,000 could afford to invest his money in these bonds, which would yield him about 3.65 per cent. Mr. GARNER overlooked the fact that the normal tax to be deducted would make it that.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Surely.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. A 4 per cent bond could bear an income tax as high as 12 per cent and still be better than a 3½ per cent tax-free bond. I think that was what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] had in mind.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, my thought was that supposing a man's income in the aggregate, including the interest on his bonds, was such as to take the 15 per cent rate of surtax, then he would only be getting $3.20 on his bond, whereas the man whose income was not sufficiently large to pay the surtax would not be charged with any surtax at all; or, if he had a greater amount, if it was all from bonds, he would not pay it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The practical proposition is that any man with more than $5,000 income would get less than 4 per cent net on the bond.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose all the income was from bonds. If he only had $5,000 income, that would not be subject to tax. Let us assume that and then assume that he had $45,000 from other sources.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would not make any difference.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; he would be compelled to add the interest on the bonds to the other $45,000, and that $5,000 would be classed in the category of income and would take the $5,000 income-tax rate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What I meant is that no matter how large the income may be, provided he has an income greater than $5,000, he will not get as much as 4 per cent on the bond.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand, if he only had $3,000 from the bonds—

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am speaking of the total income from all sources. If he has more than $5,000 income he would not get as much as 4 per cent on his bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that because a man has an income from other sources he ought to be compelled to take a less rate of interest on his Government bonds than the man who has no other income?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not speaking about the wisdom of the policy.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman make clear how a 4 per cent Government bond, say to a man who has an income of $25,000 or $50,000, can be classified as being a part of the excess-profits tax?

Mr. MADDEN. It becomes a part of the total income, and if his total income is large enough he may be taxed 50 per cent on the interest that he receives from the Government.

Mr. MEEKER. I see that; but can you classify the 4 per cent on a Government bond as excess profits?

Mr. MADDEN. It would go into the total profits and would be subject to the excess profits, and it might reduce the interest received from the Government from 4 per cent to 2 per cent. The thing that I want to get clearly before the House and the country is that we are not dealing with every purchaser of bonds alike in this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would my colleague be in favor of segregating that part of a man's income that came from interest on these bonds?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I would, on the bonds. I think the interest ought to be segregated, so that all the purchasers of the bonds would be placed on an equality. Otherwise you are not going to sell these bonds.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Can not that be worked out by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] by exempting all bonds up to $10,000, and taxing them above?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether it could or not. I am stating my analysis of the bill so that the Ways and Means Committee may so modify the bill as to treat every bondholder on the basis of exact equality. There is no reason why one American should receive 2 per cent on his investment in Government bonds and another receive 4 per cent on his investment in Government bonds.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROSE. I want to make this suggestion: In preparing the account showing the income of an individual, is there anything in the present law to prevent him from setting aside up to $5,000 the amount received as income from these bonds?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Would the gentleman distinguish in Government bonds? A man holding a promissory note, if he has a big income, must pay the larger tax; and why should there be any distinction between the income from the promissory note and the Government bond?

Mr. MADDEN. You compel the owner of the bond when he puts it in with the rest of his income to pay the normal tax; it takes the normal tax, it takes the surtax, and it takes the war tax. It is not the income on bonds that you distinguish in that regard.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, if gentlemen will permit me, that I believe that there is a great deal in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said. What we want to do is to make this a popular loan; that is, a loan that will be taken by millions of people with small incomes. By putting a proposition such as he offers in the bill, I believe it will popularize the loan and make everybody, rich or poor or of modest means, buy at least the amount of bonds excepted in his amendment. I will ask him if he will not agree to accept an amendment to his amendment making it $5,000 instead of $10,000?

Mr. CANNON. If that is the judgment of the gentleman, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, I am willing to accept it.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Let me suggest that it is exempt now up to $5,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; if a person has an income of over $5,000, and a part was from $10,000 of these bonds, he would be subject to the supertax on that $400 interest.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If a person has an income of $5,000, he does not have to pay any tax under this bill. Any person with an income of $5,000 or less would not pay any tax under this bill except an inheritance tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true with an income of $5,000 or less. Suppose a man has an income of $50,000 and a part of that income of $50,000 is interest upon $10,000 worth of bonds or $5,000 worth of bonds or $50,000 worth of bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In other words, it will make no difference how much income a man has so far as this $5,000 worth of bonds is concerned.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. In the language of Mr. CANNON's amendment it will notify everyone, rich and poor, and men of moderate means alike, that they can buy $5,000 worth of these bonds and be scot-free from excess profits or supertax or any tax Congress now or hereafter may levy, except the estate and inheritance tax.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that would cover my objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would a man be permitted to buy one for himself, one for his wife, and one for each of his children?

Mr. KITCHIN. He could do that now under the present law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And be exempt?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if he would give his wife the bond—do not say buy, but suppose I would give my wife $5,000—oh, but that is impossible, a preposterous supposition so far as I am concerned—but suppose the gentleman should give his wife $5,000 in money, he would give it to her.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As a gift.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; or suppose the gentleman gives his son $5,000 and he goes and buys bonds. The $5,000 of bonds would still be exempt, but would belong to the gentleman's wife and son. That could be done under the present law, provided the wife and son did not have incomes to exceed $5,000.

Mr. MEEKER. Do I understand the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is that he shall be the owner of the bond instead of the holder?

Mr. KITCHIN. The owner of the bond.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman one question? Would the effect be the same whether a man bought originally $5,000 of bonds or converted his 3½ per cent bonds which he owns now into $5,000 of these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. He could do that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He would be exempt whichever way he did it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; because he would be the owner of the bonds.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the "$10,000" in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be stricken out and "$5,000" inserted in lieu thereof.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a proposition which it is most difficult and almost impossible to settle in an accurate, uniform, and equitable way. Our Federal bonds are in a category by themselves in one or two respects. For example, our State and municipal bonds are supposed to be entirely exempt from taxation, and yet those bonds issued in one State are subject to taxation in the other 47 States of the Union, and the great bulk of them, as a rule, are not held in States where issued. The standard investment—I mean the investment in standard securities, of course—is subject to all kinds of taxation, Federal and local, whereas a Federal bond is not subject to taxation in any State of the Union, but it is only subject to such tax as the Congress might see fit to impose upon it. The difficulty, of course, in reaching an equitable solution of this matter is due to two causes. One relates to the interest rate and the other, of course, to the method of imposing the tax. Of course, if the Federal bonds should bear an interest rate on a level with standard securities, there would be no difficulty about imposing income tax, both normal and super, because the effect would be uniform; but that is not the case. The Federal bond is not subject to State or local taxation, nor to any Federal stamp tax. It is subject to no burden except such as Congress may impose upon it in the way of a tax or in the way of reduced rates of interest or interest advantages to the purchasers. The problem is to reach a basis that will place the large purchaser on or nearer an equality with the small purchaser so far as interest advantages are concerned.

A bond could be issued at 4½ per cent subject to super and normal income tax combined and the little fellow would not be materially interfered with, and a considerable percentage of the larger purchasers could handle that bond as a satisfactory business investment, although those who pay an income tax of 40 or 50 or 60 per cent could not do so when compared with the advantages of standard investment. But that would result in the Government giving away a tremendous interest advantage to the middle class and smaller investors. I notice that during the war some of the other governments undertook to carry the entire income tax on their bond issues. The first issue in England, I believe, was at 3½ per cent, which was equivalent to 3.80 per cent, it having been issued at 95, subject to the entire income tax. That bond soon went to a discount. The next year they issued a large amount at 4½ per cent, subject to the entire income tax. That bond soon went to a discount. In February of this year they were still undertaking to retain in the Government the right to impose the entire income tax on these bonds in the future. The Government did not feel justified in unconditionally surrendering that right at least ultimately to tax them. The Government took something near the interest level in the country at that time. They figured it at 5.33 per cent. Their normal income tax was 25 per cent, or 5 shillings, and they said, "We will compound this normal tax and see what the interest rate would be." Twenty-five per cent normal tax deducted from the 5.33 per cent interest rate left an interest rate of 4 per cent, subject only to the super tax.

They put that bond on the market and they also placed an alternative proposition on the market. They said, "We will put this 5.33 per cent bond at 95 on the market subject to the entire income tax rate, which was 25 per cent normal and 42½ top super." The result was the purchasers practically all took the 5½ per cent bond subject to the entire income tax in preference to the flat 4 per cent bond subject only to the super tax. Now, it is apparent that any purchaser of bonds would take those 4 per cent bonds in preference to the 3½ per cent free bonds until his aggregate income entailed upon him a tax rate in the aggregate as high as 12 per cent. When it passed 12 per cent the bonds would be worth less to him than a 3½ per cent tax-free bond. Now, of course, the $2,000,000,000 which was floated will gravitate into the hands of the big holders for the reason that the interest advantages to them will increase according to the increased super-income tax rate imposed on them. A man subject to an income tax of 50 per cent would find a 3½ per cent tax-free bond to be worth just double the rate, or 7 per cent, when compared with the returns from a standard investment subject to taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I must insist we are making a serious mistake to put any tax feature in this bill. By making them subject to taxation we are destroying the value of the bond on the market in the hands of the Government. There is no question about that in my mind. This amendment is a step in the right direction, and I want it added to the bill, at least, with the hope that when the bill goes to the Senate that body will strike out the whole tax feature, for this reason: Make these bonds subject to tax and it is going to force them into the hands of small purchasers only. No man of large income can afford to buy the taxable bonds. He will not do it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I noticed in the papers some time ago that a man put $50,000,000 into the 3½ per cent bonds. It has been said here repeatedly during the debate that they would not change from the 3½ per cent to the 4 per cent bond if the 4 per cent bonds are taxed, but if you take the taxes off the 4 per cent bond they will take the 4 per cent bond.

Mr. FORDNEY. I suppose that is true. I have said that myself. I do not believe anybody holding these 3½ per cent bonds, free from taxation, will surrender them and be a big enough fool to take the 4 per cent bonds subject to taxation, where, if his income is great, you are going to take 65 per cent of that 4 cents and leave him only 1.4 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But suppose he can get a bond that is not taxed at 4 per cent, he will do it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Surely.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He can do it unless this provision is left in the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. He certainly will. It makes the bond more attractive if it is exempted from taxes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is not the question. As I understand it, people who have got the 3½ per cent bonds have them with the option reserved to them in the act to have the rate of interest on the 3½ per cent bonds increased to the rate which any subsequent bond might bear. It has been said, however, that they would not make that change if we taxed the 4 per cent bonds, but if you take off the tax we will be paying 4 per cent on the 3½ per cent bonds. That will be a large increase.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer the gentleman and then I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois. When the 3½ per cent bonds were authorized, in April last, there was a provision put in that law that if any Government bond is sold prior to January 1, 1918, carrying a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent those bonds could be surrendered which had been authorized by the act of April 1 last and a bond at the higher rate of interest taken for it. There is no provision in the law that the bonds issued in the future would have some taxing feature to them, and I have said, and let me repeat, that before this war is over the Government of the United States must go to the men with large incomes and to the trust companies of this country to dispose of the Government bonds at par, and unless you leave them free from taxation the money will not go into the investment of Government bonds but seek other investments of greater value.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no question about that. Let me yield to the gentleman from Illinois and then I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will not the thing work out this way: The man who has a small income will convert his 3½ per cent bonds into 4 per cent bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. He will do that because, having a small income, even though he holds 4 per cent bonds, he will not pay any taxes, and the man of large income will not convert them into the 4 per cent bonds because he will have to pay taxes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but immediately upon the cessation of hostilities in Europe the small holder of bonds will immediately exchange the bonds for money. He will not carry those bonds for 20 or 30 years, and he must go to the moneyed men to exchange them for money, and the man of large means might collect a large amount of those bonds without subjecting himself to the payment of 65 per cent taxes on large incomes, which will take away from him, as I have said, all but 1.4 per cent on the 4 per cent bonds if he is a man of large means.

Let me go a little further and I will then yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. There is no question but that directly after this war is over the Government of the United States will, at the earliest opportunity authorized by law, redeem all their 4 per cent bonds by the issuance of a 2 or a 2½ per cent bond, which will readily sell after this war is over, and retire those bonds carrying a higher rate of interest. But to dispose of them now and get 100 cents on the dollar with the taxing feature in it, you are not going to do it, except to the small money lender.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit, is it not true that England offered bonds under three conditions—one tax free, one subject to certain taxes, and one subject to all taxes, and with varying rates of interest—and that the investors took the bonds subject to all the taxes in preference to the others?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not able to answer the question. I do not deny the correctness of the gentleman's statement, but he must not forget that the system of taxation in Great Britain has no comparison with ours. The Government of Great Britain imposes all the taxes. There are no State, county, and municipal taxes. The taxes imposed by the Government of Great Britain are all the taxes that are paid in Great Britain, whereas we have endless taxes in this country in addition to the taxes paid to the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if under this amendment one has purchased 3½ per cent bonds that are convertible into 4 per cent bonds they would be subject to taxation?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think they would be subject to taxation.

Mr. GARLAND. If the bonds that he purchased, the 3½ per cent and the 4 per cent, amount to over $5,000, then they would be subject?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all. There is a $5,000 exemption there. Five thousand dollars of bonds will be exempted from this surtax.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think you understand me. What I mean is this: Suppose that he had already purchased $3,000 at 3½ per cent, and he buys under this $3,000 more of the 4 per cent bonds. Is the whole of that subject to tax because the two together amount to over $5,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; $5,000 of it would be exempted from taxation. Only the interest on $1,000 would be taxed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rather sympathize with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. As I said yesterday, I think it doubtful whether we ought to issue these bonds bearing 4 per cent interest. Under this section 7 these 4 per cent bonds are to be subject to the graduated additional income tax, or surtax.

Now, as I understand it, there are two objects in that. One is to enable, or, rather, to enforce upon the public generally the purchase of these bonds, and the second is to prevent large sums of money of the very rich people from escaping taxation.

Under the act approved September 8, 1916, which was an act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," there is a provision which authorizes a normal tax of 2 per cent upon incomes, and another provision which authorizes an additional income tax known as a surtax, or super-tax, of 1 per cent upon all incomes exceeding $20,000 per annum. The tax is graduated. It begins with 1 per cent on incomes which exceed $20,000 and do not exceed $40,000 and ranges on up to 13 per cent upon incomes exceeding $2,000,000 annually. Section 4 of the bill provides that certain securities and incomes shall be exempt both from the normal and excess taxes. Among other securities exempted is the "interest upon the obligations of a State or any political subdivision thereof." Now, I am not objecting to exempting the bonds of States, counties, cities, and other municipalities from the income and surtaxes. The point I wish to make is that it is not wise policy for the United States to tax its own bonds and exempt from taxation the bonds of States and political subdivisions thereof. If this is done, it places State, county, and city bonds in a more favorable position than the bonds of the Federal Government. Inevitably it will drive us to the point where a State, county, city, or small town can borrow money cheaper than the United States. My idea is that in the future, as in the past, the bonds of the Federal Government should be sold bearing a lower rate of interest than the bond of any State, municipality, or corporation.

Now, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. I have just quoted the provisions of the act of September 8, 1916, and especially of section 4, that exempts from taxation the obligation of a State or any political subdivision thereof. According to official statistics, there are in existence over $4,000,000,000 worth of the bonds of States, counties, cities, and smaller municipalities. These are exempt from both the normal taxes and surtaxes. The men of great wealth in this country can invest in these bonds to the amount of $4,000,000,000 without even paying the normal income tax under existing law. I would like to know what the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means thinks about the exemption of such bonds from taxation.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are exempt.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, does the gentleman think it a wise policy for the United States to put out its bonds and tax them, and then exempt the $4,000,000,000 of State and municipal bonds entirely from this taxation?

Mr. KITCHIN. But you must remember that these State bonds and other securities you mention are subject to State, county, and municipal taxes, which are largely in excess of the Federal tax.

Mr. MORGAN. They are not subject to tax in their own States.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are subject to tax when they are purchased outside of the State. I want to say to you that in your State and my State, four-fifths of them, and more than that, are purchased outside of the State. Another thing, I doubt if we have a constitutional right to tax the income of State, county, or municipal bonds. I doubt if we can tax a State bond for Federal purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not concede that, although I have not examined the law. It may be the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is correct that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to tax State, county, city, or other municipal bonds. But if that be true it only emphasizes my contention that it is unwise for the Federal Government to tax its own bonds, and thus in a manner prohibit men of large wealth from investing therein. Especially is this true when there are $4,000,000,000 of State and municipal bonds which under existing law are exempt from Federal taxes. What can we gain by driving great wealth from investment in Federal bonds when there is in existence another class of bonds—aggregating about $4,000,000,000—in which this great wealth can be invested and hide from taxation? I desire to repeat that even if it were constitutional I am not advocating Federal taxation of State bonds or those of municipalities organized under State laws, but I do wish again to call in question the wisdom of increasing the rate of interest on Government bonds from 3½ per cent, free from taxation, to a Government bond bearing 4 per cent interest subject to taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, before we vote on this amendment I want to call the attention of the committee very particularly to the wording of it, because I am satisfied it is not so worded as to carry out the intention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who proposed the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let it be reported again.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If there is no objection, Mr. Chairman, let it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, the intention of the gentleman from Illinois doubtless was that it was to be subject only to the taxes specified, so far as the excess over $5,000 is concerned; but from the way the amendment is drawn, as soon as a corporation or a copartnership holds over $5,000 it would be subject to the tax, not simply on the excess but on the whole amount, which would not be as is intended. It is rather difficult to draw an amendment that will exactly fit the case.

Mr. CANNON. If the man has $5,000 he is exempt; that is, if he owns it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It provides "subject to the taxes specified." I will read the language of the bill as it will be:

Upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations owning more than $5,000 of the securities,

And so forth.

Now, the class that is subject to the tax are those that own more than $5,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is it.

Mr. CANNON. That is what we intended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no; that is not what is intended. Mr. TEMPLE. Would the gentleman object if we should leave this stand and then add: "Provided, That any individual, copartnership, association, or corporation may hold $5,000 of these bonds free from tax?"

Mr. CANNON. That would do.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that you put it this way: "Provided, That the amount of interest on the amount of such bonds mentioned in this section in excess of $5,000 shall not be exempted."

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to interrupt the gentleman from Iowa just a moment right there in regard to the effect of this amendment. To exempt $10,000 in the hands of each supertaxpayer would amount to $2,500,000 of bonds. A little over 250,000 supertaxpayers, I believe, are shown by the recent returns of the income tax.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that by agreement the amount of exemption has been reduced to $5,000.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. At $5,000 it would be, at 4 per cent, $1,250,000,000, or $50,000,000 annual interest, which it would not exempt from the income tax, but if the bonds are to be paid off in 15 years it would be $750,000,000 interest exemption.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What the gentleman from Tennessee says applies to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I was just interjecting a statement of the amount involved.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was suggesting the form of the amendment rather than speaking of the merits of it.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I understood that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not entirely sure, but I think that we should simply add the words "upon such excess"—the tax imposed by the United States upon the income or profits of corporations owning more than $5,000 of the securities specified above, and upon such excess; but I am not entirely clear about that. I think it would take a little time to get the amendment in proper form. I think it might be well to pass over the matter temporarily.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think it could be corrected by adding after the words "income or profits" the amount desired. [Cries of "Vote!"] We ought not to vote until the amendment is correctly worded.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that we pass this amendment over informally until it is perfected.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that, too. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that we pass over this amendment and return to it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this section be passed over temporarily. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I call up the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. If section 7 goes over for future consideration, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will go over also.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not understand that the section goes over; only the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. When the Chair was interrupted by the gentleman from Wisconsin he was about to announce that section 7 would go over for future consideration. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Page 10, line 12, strike out the word "or" at the beginning of the line and in lieu thereof insert the word "and."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we accept that as a proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The further consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is deferred and may be returned to later on, before the passage of the bill and the motion that the committee finally arise. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act, a sum not exceeding one-seventh of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and war-saving certificates and one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness herein authorized is hereby appropriated, or as much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct: Provided, That in addition to the reports now required by law, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on the first Monday in December, 1918, and annually thereafter, transmit to the Congress a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 12, line 2, after the word "rent," insert "and $2,500,000 for the payment of advertising."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is proposed to be inserted in the second line of the paragraph, so that it will read, "That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, and $2,500,000 for advertising connected with any operations under this act," and so on—

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be in addition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It would be taken out of this one-seventh of 1 per cent which the paragraph authorizes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not that mean an appropriation in addition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I think not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the way it reads.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman thinks so, I will undertake to perfect the amendment before a vote is taken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that an attempt was made in committee to cut down this sum total, and it was cut down a little, to its present aggregate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, if the gentleman proposes to add $2,500,000 to the sum, it seems to me he will encounter opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have no desire to add to the sum. At the suggestion just made to me by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] I will in a moment amend the amendment by making its form so that it can not be misunderstood.

As to the cutting down by the committee of the sum to be paid for the turning over of this bond issue, I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury did not in the hearings express himself as absolutely opposed to the plan for national advertising. He doubted that a general plan could be perfected and feared it might not reach all of the newspapers and advertising mediums, and that the expense would be too heavy. He intimated, however, that he would not agree to an advertising plan out of the sum allotted for the turning over of these bonds when the percentage for expense was placed at a higher figure than now appears in the bill. However, after this bill was reported to the House, with the amount for handling the bonds less than had been named originally, the statement was made that no fixed sum would be spent for advertising.

I want to say very frankly that I believe that to have it understood that nothing would be spent by the Government for advertising in handling this enormous issue of bonds would be a tremendous mistake; and I want to say further that the authorization of $2,500,000 as a portion of this one-seventh would be a trifling sum, while it would add 50 per cent to the efficiency and the business effort to turn over this bond issue quickly and correctly and with the minimum of lost motion. Now, of course, the newspapers will boost, and boost hard, even if they receive not a single penny, but they will do it spasmodically, without system and in a disorganized way. Why not have the advertising done according to system, each advertisement in order, each one in sequence, so that the pulling power of all is of full value? This is the one detail that should not be overlooked. Do not think that the newspapers are not patriotic and that they will not promote this bond sale to the limit; but do not, I beg of you, be parties to the riding of a gift horse to death.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman say how many newspapers there are in the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can. I have here a sheet of most interesting statistics, but I am using most of my extremely limited time in a general statement. I shall need a little more time than five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall ask that the gentleman's time be extended, because this is a very important matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman. I think the question is of the utmost importance to the successful disposition of these bonds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How many newspapers are there in the United States which might seek this advertising?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There are 20,000 newspapers and available publications.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Surely there are more than 20,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There are, of course, a few that will not expect this advertising. For instance, certain popular monthly magazines go to press fully 60 days ahead of their dated line. It would be hardly practicable to advertise in the monthly magazines for the first campaign. Then, further, there are some strictly technical and class publications which would not expect to seek advertising of this kind. And there are a few college dailies which are not in the general advertising field. But the dailies, the weeklies, the farm papers, and all of the others would come in on a general advertising campaign of great power and force, each to receive its exact share according to its accepted rate card.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman's list of available advertising papers include agricultural papers and trade papers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; all of them.

Mr. SLOAN. And it is not contemplated that there shall be any distinction as to partisanship?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Absolutely none. That is just what is to be avoided. Gentlemen, everyone knows that, next to money itself, advertising is the thing that makes the wheels go round, and the brightest minds that are known to the advertising business have organized to aid this Government just the same as the automobile manufacturers and others organized, and they have prepared and presented a plan, with which I regret to say I am only partially familiar, but enough so to give you a fair outline.

By this plan, for $2,500,000 they will place real advertising to the amount of from two to four pages of newspaper size in the 1,773 daily papers of the United States with a circulation of more than 24,000,000 copies daily; and in 14,000 country weeklies with a weekly circulation of 14,541,000 copies; and in several hundred foreign-language papers and in—

Mr. SLOAN. I should like to ask the gentleman right there if it is not understood that in the presentation of this plan, if the advertising is fairly distributed to the best advertising mediums—that is, the newspapers—there will be large additional notice given, editorial and otherwise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly. Now, for $2,500,000 you can not only advertise in all of the weeklies, all of the dailies, nearly all of the foreign-language papers and all of the farm papers and even the religious papers, but also in all of the street cars and with all of the billboard organizations, which cover every city. If all that is not worth considering, nothing is. I do not think the House should overlook this. The plan has been carefully prepared. Further, this is not a staggering sum or even a large sum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman examined the situation sufficiently to be able to say how much might be apportioned amongst these 20,000 newspapers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; $1,500,000 of this sum will go to the daily and weekly newspapers, including the cost of matrices.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How would the gentleman apportion the appropriation—in accordance with the circulation of the newspapers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; in part. It is proposed to utilize the advertising machinery of the great agencies, which machinery is already set up and is just as necessary to the newspaper business generally and the periodical business as railroads are necessary to business operations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I concede all that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We will use that machinery.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I concede all that, but how would the selection be made in order to be fair to the entire newspaper fraternity?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It will be made by placing from two to four pages in every publication at its actual advertising rates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At their ordinary advertising rates?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. At their ordinary advertising rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington be extended five minutes. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, the railroads of the United States advertised in all the newspapers of the country last year at an expense of $249,000. That is not a great sum when you consider the number of railroads and the amount of advertising for a year and the business that resulted.

Mr. KEATING. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the expenses were $249,000,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If I said millions, I meant thousands—$249,000.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman think that the railroads increased their business enough to warrant the spending of that amount?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I know they did.

Mr. GORDON. How does the gentleman know it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They carried advertising for passenger trade and they thought it profitable, and it was profitable.

Mr. GORDON. The railroad carries everybody that comes, and if a man does not want to go he does not go.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman from Ohio is sitting in Cleveland on a hot July day and reads an alluring advertisement of an excursion rate on an electrified railroad across the Rockies and the Cascades to the Pacific Northwest, where it is cool and comfortable, he may become possessed of an idea to take the trip.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The railroads do not even publish the time tables in most of the counties in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If they do not, they go on the theory that the time table carries an element of news which the newspaper might carry on its own account.

Mr. CANNON. But they do not publish them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The papers of this town publish the time tables, do they not?

Mr. CANNON. I do not think so. They do not publish them in Danville or in any place in my district.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, that is neither here nor there. I desire to discuss the reaching of the little newspapers with a systematic series of bond-selling advertisements.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not know about these advertisements; are you going to reach all the country papers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Every last one of them.

Mr. CANNON. I think there are more than 20,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no. The number now existing has been carefully computed.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says two to four pages—some papers do not have four pages.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If a paper is only a half sheet, it must have two pages.

Mr. FORDNEY. How many insertions would the money the gentleman speaks of give in the great daily papers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That would carry on a systematic campaign of advertising for one month in the country papers; that would not mean an insertion every day in a great daily like the Chicago Tribune, but it would mean two pages in the Saturday Evening Post at a cost of $2,500 a page.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman's amendment provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall expend two and a half million dollars of the sum available for advertising—

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much will be left for the Secretary for other purposes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. About $15,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Fourteen million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. How does the gentleman arrive at that figure?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I was informed in debate yesterday by the chairman [Mr. KITCHIN] that the total overturn under the one-seventh of 1 per cent would be about $17,600,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. One-seventh of 1 per cent of the total amount. I would like to know just what that is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The total comes from one-seventh of the amount of the bonds and the war-saving certificates and one-tenth of the amount of the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury under this phraseology is limited in the expenditure of these amounts by the percentages stated in the bill, or whether he has the privilege to spend the total amount for any purpose?

Mr. KITCHIN. He is limited only by the amount stated in the bill, one-seventh of 1 per cent of the bonds and war-saving certificates and one-tenth of 1 per cent on the amount of certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman contemplate publishing an advertisement in the weekly papers as well as the dailies, including all weekly papers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Including the smallest weekly newspaper that has the second-class privilege of postage rate.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. BORLAND. Do I understand the purpose of the amendment is to set aside two and a half million dollars of the funds devoted to placing the bonds to be used for newspaper advertising?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For all advertising—newspapers, periodicals, street cars, and billboards—largely at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BORLAND. Does it require him to spend that amount for advertising?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It names advertising as part of the necessary expenses and gives $2,500,000 as the top figure for the advertising campaign.

Mr. BORLAND. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there are 20,000 daily papers in the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; I thought there were about 25,000 publications of all kinds, but I am told now that the number is a few more than 20,000 periodicals, daily and weekly, and the like.

Mr. BORLAND. Assuming that there are 20,000, that would give about $125 to each paper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but it is not designed to prorate it that way.

Mr. BORLAND. How far would that go toward advertising in a great paper that has a real circulation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Each paper would not get $125. Some would receive much more. Say there is a paper in Joplin, Mo., and its rate by the page once a week for a month is 18 cents an inch. The advertising would be placed at that rate, whereas in the Chicago Tribune it might be $1.25 an inch, and the Tribune would get four insertions at its rate.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman think that an average of $125 would produce the results that are expected?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The sum is not divided by the number of papers. If a paper had 2,000 subscribers in a community of 10,000 people, and those 10,000 people read the local advertisement carrying an explanation of the short-time issue of these war-emergency certificates, written by some of the brainiest men in the United States who know how to write advertisements, I know it would double the sale of these bonds in one-half the time that will be necessary otherwise.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman that $125 would get just about one-quarter of a page one Sunday morning in a Kansas City newspaper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the Kansas City daily papers would get much more than that.

Mr. BORLAND. About one-quarter of a page on Sunday morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Kansas City newspaper has an advertising agent in New York City, and his rate card is there, and this estimate is made up upon that basis. The Kansas City paper will get its rate. That applies not only to the Kansas City Star, but to the St. Louis Globe Democrat, the New Orleans Picayune, the Chicago Tribune, and all of the big dailies, and then on down to the small dailies and on down to the weeklies.

I want to assure the membership that this is a practical plan. It is all left to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is not averse to it at all, and it simply gives an indication on the part of Congress that it is desired that in selling these great bond issues, out of this $17,600,000 authorized for the overturn of the bonds, there shall be placed with all of the newspapers and advertising agencies of the country the sum of $2,500,000. It is not too much at all.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. What organization figured out those estimates?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A series of associations representing all the leading advertising men who were recently called upon to come before the Secretary of the Treasury with the plan.

Mr. RAINEY. When did that occur?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Within the last few days. The notice from the Secretary gave very short time. They had only 24 hours in which to appear. I think the entire plan written out is on his desk, and I have not any doubt at all that as this bond sale goes on that he will endeavor to carry it out, but I think the least Congress can do is to make sure that we have proper publicity for the sale down into the last hamlet of the United States. One thing more: Both France and England have systematically advertised their bond sales from the start and at great saving.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and offer in lieu thereof two others, which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and offer in lieu of it two others. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington offers the following: Page 12, line 2, after the word "rent," insert the words "and advertising;" and on page 12, line 9, after the word "direct," insert: "Provided that a sum not in excess of $2,500,000 of said sum shall be used for advertising in the daily and weekly papers and such other mediums of publication as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, from the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] I understand that this is not a proposition submitted by the newspapers and magazines and the billboard organizations of the country, but it is a proposition promoted and advocated by those advertising agencies in this country which place advertisements in the newspapers and magazines of the country, and perhaps also in the street cars and on billboards throughout the land. I deny that the patriotic newspapers and magazines of the country are demanding pay for the services they render their country in publishing the interesting reading notices which have reference to the placing of war bonds, and the necessity for it. Large, full-page advertisements have recently appeared in the newspapers of Washington advocating payment to newspapers and magazines for their services to the country. These particular advertisements are inserted not at the expense of any newspaper or magazine, but they are paid for and inserted by a great agency which supplies to 8,000 newspapers in the land boiler-plate advertisements for their inside or outside sheets. I do not believe that for $2,500,000 four pages of reading matter can be inserted in every newspaper in the land, as has been stated on this floor, and also that a corresponding amount of billboard and street car advertising can be accomplished.

There are 20,000 newspapers and magazines—more than that in the country. Many of them do not have more than four pages in their regular issues. These small papers, when the advertising agencies dole out to them the small amount they will be willing to pay, will find if they carry these advertisements that the extra paper occasioned by inserting them will cost about as much as they can get out of the agencies. The smaller newspapers of this country are familiar with the methods of these advertising agencies. If they insert the stuff they send out in their papers, they insert it for a small compensation indeed.

The statement of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is that if his amendment goes in $2,500,000 will be distributed through these advertising agencies—through these boiler-plate companies—to the newspapers of the land. How much will the agencies keep of this amount? Ten per cent would be an exceedingly moderate estimate. If they keep 10 per cent of this amount we are then paying, not to the newspapers of the land but to the organized agencies the gentleman discusses, one-quarter of a million dollars, at the very least, for five or six weeks' work. No wonder their representatives are here in conference with the Secretary of the Treasury. No wonder their representatives are inserting in the newspapers of Washington at large expense these full-page advertisements advocating the appropriation of this sum for this purpose. No such proposition as the gentleman has discussed was ever presented for consideration to the Committee on Ways and Means, which drew this bill. This committee has until now heard no such suggestion as this. The section of the bill sought to be amended makes a definite allowance to the Secretary of the Treasury of not to exceed $17,000,000 for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses connected with the printing and placing of this enormous bond issue. He can expend of that sum as much as is required for that purpose. This is the largest transaction in the history of nations. We must place these bonds.

This section in this bill makes this allowance to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if it appears necessary in order to obtain subscriptions for these bonds to advertise in the newspapers of the country, the Secretary has the right to do it without this amendment. Throughout the land during the campaign for the sale of liberty bonds newspapers rendered most excellent service. Without compensation they continually called attention to the fact that these bonds were being offered for sale. So far as I know they did not ask any compensation. So far as I know the small newspapers of the country and the large newspapers of the country are still anxious without compensation to discharge this patriotic duty. All over this land, from ocean to ocean, men and women, banks, trust companies, and newspapers will still be found discharging their patriotic duty urging upon those who have money to invest—a small amount or a large amount—the necessity of subscribing for these bonds.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then why should we make any provision or appropriation at all for any expenses in connection with the sale of the bonds if everyone is patriotic and if everyone is willing to lend their time and assistance to the sale of them?

Mr. RAINEY. Because we are engaged now in the greatest war in history and we can not afford to take any chances, and this bond issue must be properly presented to the country in such manner as the exigencies of the campaign may demand. If every man and every woman and every agency rendering service in placing these bonds demands and receives compensation there will not be much left with which to aid the young men of the country who will soon be fighting on land and sea for our institutions and our flag.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me, there was paid in excess of $500,000 to two metropolitan newspapers to promote the last bond issue by other advertising agencies—not the Government. The advertising by the billboard advertisers given to the Government was in excess of $500,000, and they will do it again. So with the newspapers. But now the Secretary himself says that these bond houses and others who spent money out of their own pockets should not be asked to do it again, and so long as there is a necessity for this expense I contend that the newspapers should be paid something.

Mr. RAINEY. Newspapers and individuals who desire to tender their services ought to have that opportunity. I understand that these newspaper advertising associations and this association which inserts these large advertisements in our city papers advocating this method of procedure expect to make a large amount of money out of it. This organization so inserting these large advertisements asking pay for newspapers for this patriotic service sells the boiler-plate advertisements that will be used throughout the land in 8,000 papers or possibly more than that. These advertising agencies who are here are not here at the request of the patriotic newspapers of this land and their owners. They are here because they expect themselves to pull down commissions out of this transaction. That is the reason they are here. They have simply joined the vultures that hover over this Capitol. If it is necessary to pay any man or any newspaper for services of value in connection with the negotiation of these bonds, we will have to do it, of course. But I object to a proposition that makes it obligatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to donate, to give, to the advertising agencies of this land $2,500,000 in cash, a part of the same to be distributed by them among the newspapers, magazines, and billboard organizations of the country—such part of the same to be so distributed as they may in their generosity determine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. It may be necessary to do so. These papers have varying advertising value. Some of them have a circulation of only a few hundred, some a circulation of many thousands. If in the congressional district of any Member this money is unequally distributed among the newspapers, you are going to hear from it. You are insulting the publishers of the country when you propose to dole out to them through cut-throat advertising agencies such part of $2,500,000 as these agencies may be willing to divide with them.

Leave these matters in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury; he will keep down the expense of negotiating these bonds to the minimum, and if we are compelled to select advertising mediums, whether billboards, which now tender their services for nothing, or the newspapers, which now tender their services for nothing, and pay for it, he is capable of doing it and paying them according to their recognized advertising rates, if that is what they charge. I think we ought to give them the opportunity of rendering this service for nothing if they want to do it for nothing. If the small newspapers demand pay, and it is necessary to pay them in order to float these bonds, why, we will have to pay, of course; but we ought not to pay them through these advertising agencies. The money paid newspapers ought to be paid to them direct from the Treasury of the United States; it should not reach them through agencies which expect to retain a large part of the amount allotted as commissions. Referring now to the great national newspapers and magazines, I want to say that if they will give up the $90,000,000 mail subsidy they now pull down out of the Treasury of the United States, and which they cling to with such tenacity, we could afford to pay them a much larger sum than is contemplated in this proposed amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, the section of the bill under consideration authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to spend about $11,000,000 in floating the issue of bonds provided by this bill. That amount, it seems, has been estimated to be necessary both by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Ways and Means Committee who reported this bill to the House. While that seems to be a very large amount it may be necessary.

The amendment now under consideration provides that $2,500,000 of that amount be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury in advertising, being less than 25 per cent of the amount of the expenditures contemplated. If this amount is to be expended in floating this bond issue, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], and which is now under consideration, for the reason that I believe it is right and will be a practical and efficient way for advertising this bond issue. When State, county, and municipal bonds are to be floated, they are advertised in newspapers and periodicals read by people who would likely be interested in the purchase of such bonds. It is desired that this issue of bonds be a popular one.

Provision is made for the issuance of bonds of small denomination in order that they may be purchased by men and women of small means and income. The best way to bring such bonds to their attention is to advertise them in the country newspaper, oftentimes the only paper they have an opportunity to read.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How much did they have to pay the newspapers for the last bond issue for advertising?

Mr. ALMON. I do not suppose the Government had to pay them anything. It may be that some of the large daily newspapers were paid, but the country newspapers were not paid anything. It is true that the country newspapers out of a spirit of patriotism donated to the Government their space and substance in advertising the last bond issue and the regulations of the draft law, and they deserve the praise and thanks of the people of the Nation for their valuable and gratuitous service. But some at least of the newspapers now claim that on account of the high cost of print-paper and everything else that goes to make up the expense of publishing a newspaper has advanced so much that they should be paid a reasonable rate for advertising the second bond issue as every other class of men who contribute their means and labor for the Government are paid. Many of the small country newspapers are struggling for existence and are making less profits than any other class of business for the amount of capital and labor invested. Patriotism will not pay the expenses of the publication of a newspaper. I believe that we ought to be fair with all classes of our people who render service to the Government, and I do not think that it is fair for the Government, even in times of war, to expect advertisement of its business to be donated when everyone else is paid for his service.

It is said that the Secretary of the Treasury is not willing to call on the bankers of the country again for assistance in negotiating this bond issue for the reason that they rendered assistance in the last bond issue without compensation. For the same reason he should not expect the newspapers to again contribute their space without compensation, and I dare say that this bond issue could not be floated without the assistance of the daily and weekly papers of this country.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has referred to the proposed amendment as a donation to the newspapers. It is not a donation in any sense of the word. He also intimates that it could not be fairly and equitably apportioned among the newspapers of the country. There is no reason why this amount can not be fairly and equitably apportioned among the newspapers and periodicals, as has been fully explained by the author of this amendment. The gentleman also intimates that some advertising agency would get a percentage. I do not know that it would be necessary that such an agency be employed; but, if it was, the Secretary of the Treasury could fix its compensation, which no doubt would be a very small percentage. He also refers to the low rate of postage on second-class mail matter. That is no argument against the amendment under consideration. He seems to overlook the fact that one purpose of Congress in fixing a low rate of postage on newspapers and periodicals inures to the benefit of the subscribers as much, if not more, than to the publishers. The millions of people who are able to read valuable weekly farm papers and other weeklies for $1 per year would not enjoy that privilege if it were not for the low rate of postage on second-class mail matter. It may be that there should be some change as to such rates, but that question is not now before the House and should not have been injected into this discussion.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] also says there is no newspaper lobby here asking for the adoption of this amendment. That is true, and it is to their credit. If there was such a lobby here, he would probably assign that as one of the objections to the amendment; but we do know that many of the newspaper men of the country have said that they should not be asked to donate their advertising space, which is all they have to sell, for the second bond issue when no one else is giving anything.

The publishers of 6,000 country newspapers in the United States are as patriotic and good a class of citizens as we have in this country. They donated millions of dollars' worth of their space to aid in floating the first bond issue, and many of them purchased these bonds as far as they were able. So let the Government now be fair to them, and if a large amount is to be expended in floating this bond issue, as it seems will be from the opinion of those in a position to know, then let the part provided for by this amendment be expended in advertising. I believe it will be the best and most economical way of disposing of these bonds to the best advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this proposition. In the floating of this $7,500,000,000 of bonds the proposition as it now stands contemplates an expenditure of about $11,000,000.

Four million dollars is for floating the certificates of indebtedness. Now, then, the amount appropriated by this amendment would be less than 25 per cent of the total amount provided for the expenditures for floating the bonds. I believe that in the disposition of the money of the country, if there are to be large expenditures, while a large discretion be given to the administration officers, it should not entirely be taken from this House. I think that the best advertising medium in this country is the weekly paper in every county throughout this Union. I think the next is the daily paper, and following these are the agricultural and trade papers. And those papers are the ones that are read at the fireside and believed in by the readers. They are not the sporadic presentation of a project brought about by speeches of men and by brass bands. They are the usual medium of communication of good and patriotic business doctrine. They are the best advertising medium on earth.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. There is nothing in the bill as it now stands that will prevent any paper in the United States from voluntarily publishing any advertisement the Secretary of the Treasury might offer?

Mr. SLOAN. Not at all. And there should not be; and I doubt not that if this fair business proposition is carried out, this advertising medium—I speak of the papers themselves—with the patriotic impulses of those papers, in addition to carrying out the business contract they make with the Government, will show upon their editorial pages and elsewhere a large amount of free, effective advertising.

Now, I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that the newspapers of this country ought to pay their carriage. Most of the newspapers are doing that now. There is no difference between us on that proposition. It is a business matter, and the sooner we come to a business basis with the newspapers and other publications of this country the better it will be for the newspapers and the country. For that reason I am in favor not only of exacting from the newspapers what they should pay for their carriage between points in this country, but I believe, where this Government has a large amount of business to do, and this Congress has the power to direct it, it should not neglect its opportunities to see that fair treatment is accorded them. This matter is not new. It was brought up before the Committee on Ways and Means. It was discussed there with the Secretary of the Treasury. The proposition presented was discussed at that time. The question was asked of the Secretary how the distribution would be made under the plan. He said it would not be confined to any party, faction, sect, or trade, but every recognized public medium for advertising would be recognized, one the same as the other and without discrimination. And it seems to me that this Congress, in setting apart $11,000,000 for the floating of this $7,500,000,000 of bonds, could well exercise its proper function in saying that while we are delegating a large amount of discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury our business judgment dictates that we shall recognize the best advertising mediums in the Republic—the weekly and daily papers, the agricultural and the trade papers.

It is not enough to say the excellent patriotic support given the former loan by the press is an earnest that their space—their large stock in trade—shall be thrown open to the Secretary that he may have it free, and then pay out the millions provided in this bill to spend in doubtful experiments with ineffective means. Printer's ink will bring better results than the organized hysteria of brass bands and platform appeals.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the Secretary using his judgment as to where this money shall go or that he may pay to the newspapers a fair share or portion of this money in advertising for the sale of these bonds. But so far I have contended, and I am going to continue to contend, that the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury should not be tied. He should be permitted to handle that money to the best of his judgment in advertising for the sale of those bonds. He did state that the banks of the country and the newspapers of the country had assisted in the last sale of liberty bonds.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. Under the provisions of this bill, is it not true that if necessary the Secretary could expend a much larger sum than $2,500,000 with the newspapers?

Mr. FORDNEY. He could expend any portion of that money allowed him that he thought in his best judgment would be proper.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Did he not also state to the committee that he thought the newspapers ought to be paid for space for this purpose, showing that it is his intention to exercise his discretion to pay whatever he chose?

Mr. FORDNEY. He did, and he stated further than that that the banks of the country had very largely made the last sale of these bonds and had paid out large sums of their money. And I know that to be true. The various banks of the country were apportioned a certain amount of bonds to be sold and those banks advertised them very extensively. Not only that, but they sent men throughout the country—I know they did in the State and county in which I live—and the banks paid the expense of sending them around through the farming country to visit the various farmers who had money on deposit in the banks. The banks of the country know where the money is.

They know the owners of the money that is deposited in the banks, and therefore they sent agents about the country and the various townships, made a complete canvass of everybody who had money to loan, and induced them to subscribe for a certain amount of this last loan. And the banks and the newspapers will perform a very important part in the future in the sale of those bonds. But I do not believe that the Congress of the United States ought to say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "You shall pay so much here and so much there," in the sale of bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], and that the inference in the hearing is that the Secretary believed in advertising and that he would advertise, what would the gentleman say if after the bill had been put in the basket with the percentage reduced, the Secretary's office then said to the newspaper men there would be no advertising?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, it is going to cost a large amount of money to sell those bonds. It is going to be spent somewhere. Somebody must do some advertising, and the men who do the work ought to receive the pay.

Now, it is said that the Secretary of the Treasury, if it is left to his discretion, may give this money to friendly newspapers of his party—Democratic newspapers. Let him try it if he dare, and you will see the biggest row in the next campaign that you ever heard of. There will be a perfect hornet's nest turned loose on him. It would destroy him politically. He would not dare to do a thing of that kind. An honest man would not do it. We must contend that the Secretary of the Treasury is an honest man until we find out differently.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No one charges him with being otherwise.

Mr. FORDNEY. No. No one has attempted to convey any such idea. The idea, gentlemen, is that the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be left free to expend this money where he knows it ought to be expended.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] proposes an amendment here requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to spend at least $2,500,000 for newspaper advertising. Now, as has been stated by members of the committee, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to expend this entire sum appropriated in this bill for newspaper advertising if, in his judgment, that is how it ought to be expended. I think the bill confers too large powers entirely on the Secretary. I think it gives him entirely too much money to spend in the sale of these bonds.

Now, the great success of the last bond issue, as has been stated, was due largely to the bankers of the country, who took hold of it with their organizations and made a success of it—a tremendous success. They have never asked any compensation, and I do not understand that the newspapers are asking for any. Nobody authorized to speak for them has said that they were asking for any. The contention of the gentleman from Washington seems to be that we ought to make a donation to the newspapers. They did not charge anything before, and we do not know that they are going to charge anything this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Secretary says in the hearings that he is not ready to call upon the bankers and the mechanical institutions who floated the last loan. Is it not fair to give to the newspapers, who gave their space ad libitum to the making popular of that loan, some assistance this time?

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman will find, if he will read the statement of the Secretary with care, that the Secretary does not propose to pay anybody for advertising these bonds. What he said was that he wanted to reimburse these banking institutions for money they actually pay out to their own employees for the extra meals they purchase in doing the extra work that they may be required to perform. That is the only thing he mentions. If you are going out to buy newspaper space to hawk these bonds around among the people, where are you going to stop? So far as the newspapers and magazines are concerned, they are at present, under the existing postal laws, enjoying a subsidy of about $90,000,000 a year out of the 1 cent a pound second-class postage rates. I hope that this Congress will abolish at least a part of that subsidy before it adjourns. I think we are in a fair way to do it. That particular "graft" has cost the people of the United States $1,200,000,000 in the last 32 years. I think that now, during this war, when we are reaching down into everybody's pocket, it is a good time to reduce that. I shall have something to say about that later on.

As to this proposition of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], I can not understand why it should be brought here. The Government is not going to give people money for nothing, I hope. The newspapers had a good deal to do with that first bond issue, and talked about it a great deal, and they undoubtedly helped the flotation of it among the people. They have not asked anything. Why should we propose to volunteer to donate to them $2,500,000 out of the Public Treasury? I think this amount in the aggregate ought to be cut down. It is out of all due proportion. The last statement of figures that I saw concerning it was that it was $23,000,000. It is out of all proportion to the amount of expense involved in the last bond issue.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not that much.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is $15,000,000.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; it may be $15,000,000. Then the committee reduced it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand, can use a very large amount of this $15,000,000 with the newspapers?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; he can use it in any way he pleases.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does not the gentleman think it would be well enough to direct the manner in which this sum should be expended?

Mr. GORDON. No; I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The organization that has been referred to here as an advertising agency could do the work more cheaply than the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, all that the advertising agency does is to collect a commission on the money we appropriate and divide it up among members of the agency. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not as much afraid of being eaten up as I have been heretofore. Would it not also secure the work being done for less money by this agency than the Secretary of the Treasury could do it for?

Mr. GORDON. I do not see how. If they got this service performed before for nothing I can not see how you will get it now for less. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. On the theory that the Secretary of the Treasury will expend $2,500,000 or $5,000,000 on newspapers—

Mr. GORDON. If he did not spend anything before on the newspapers, why must we assume in advance that we must go out and buy them up now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We are going to pay a higher rate of interest on these bonds than we paid before.

Mr. GORDON. Is that a good reason why they should come forward and ask the Government for pay for advising the people to buy them? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is that any reason why we should increase the rate of interest from 3½ per cent to 4 per cent?

Mr. GORDON. We legislate here to permit the Government to put the surtax on the income from these bonds, whereas the other bonds were tax free. I think we act wisely on that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The probabilities are that future legislation will throw all the income that comes from the interest on the bonds heretofore sold in along with the interest on this bond issue.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 10 minutes.

Mr. KETTNER. I want five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman say "this section" or "this amendment"?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the House that I think it is important that we should pass this bill to-day. It is mighty important that we should pass the bill at the earliest possible moment, because it is going to take a long time to get ready the campaign for floating this issue. I think it will take at least a month to make ready for the campaign to sell $5,000,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suggest that the gentleman make the limit of time apply to the next amendment. There is another amendment to come.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will make it 15 minutes.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to have three minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Washington has already had 15 minutes. I will make it 15 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to read what Mr. McAdoo did say in regard to newspaper advertising. On page 35 of the hearing he says:

I have felt all along, I am perfectly frank to say, that if the Government entered upon a campaign of advertising in the newspaper, it ought to pay for it at reasonable rates, because the only commodity the newspapers have is their advertising, and we ought not to ask them to give it for nothing any more than to ask the steel mills to give their product for nothing or the farmers to give their produce to the Government for the purposes of the war.

So the Secretary indorses this proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield at this point? The gentleman failed to read what the Secretary said on page 38.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be explanatory.

Mr. MORGAN. I take it that on the whole the Secretary is favorable to newspaper advertising; and if I thought he was not, I would be much more in favor of this amendment. He says that we must undertake a great campaign of selling bonds, such as has never been witnessed certainly in this country or in any other country. There is only one way that the great masses of the people can be reached, and that is through the newspapers of this country, great and small. He said he wanted to compensate the bankers for their outlay. Do not the newspapers have an outlay as well as the bankers? The little amount which the newspapers of this country would get would be but a small portion of the money that they will actually expend. In this age of the world there is no great business that undertakes anything of importance without utilizing the power of the press. So in this campaign, in undertaking to sell these vast quantities of bonds, mounting up into the billions of dollars, in my judgment, it would be the height of folly, indeed almost a public calamity, if the Secretary of the Treasury did not advertise the sale of these bonds in the newspapers of the country.

The Secretary of the Treasury should advertise these bonds in the newspapers, not merely as a favor to the newspapers; he should do it as a business proposition. Public sentiment must be molded. Our citizenship must be educated. This can not be done without the aid of the press. The small amount paid to the publishers will in no sense compensate them for the space they will use in making the sale of these bonds successful. The space paid for will be but a small percentage of the amount freely given to the Government by our newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals before the bond-selling campaign will have closed. Since the inception of this war, with few exceptions, our editors have done their full duty. They have been loyal and patriotic. Throughout every section of this country the same spirit has been manifested. The calls of the Government upon them have been great. They have stood by the Government. They have upheld the President, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. They have rendered unselfish service which can not be and will not be compensated by any paid advertisements authorized by the pending amendment. The great dailies have done their part. They have not, however, done more according to their ability than county weekly newspapers have done. After all, it is the home paper, the small dailies, and county weekly papers, which wield the greatest influence. But all classes of papers should be recognized and all should be compensated, in part at least, for the expenditure necessary on their part to make the sale of these bonds successful. As I have read the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury I do not think he is opposed to the proposition. In my judgment he will be glad to have Congress vote favorably on this proposition, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Oklahoma had read a little further in the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury he would have found that it was the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury not to pay out any of this money for advertising in newspapers. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] says that there is no demand by the newspapers of this country that this amendment be passed. Some week or 10 days ago I received a letter from a publication in my district, and a few days afterwards I received another communication upon this very proposition, both of which letters I sent to the publicity committee of the Council of National Defense. They were pointing out the fact how loyally the newspapers had supported the last liberty loan, how generously they gave their space in advertising the Red Cross fund and in popularizing the conscription act, and that for all these activities of the Government they had been giving their space without stint. They point out that they have to pay more for their paper, ink, and everything that goes into the make-up of a newspaper than ever before, and they say they can not hope to exist if they continue to give their space as they have been giving it. I think the Congress should bear in mind that this is but the beginning of the sale of bonds. There will be many other bond issues to be sold hereafter, and if we wish to keep the continued good will of the people of this country, whose money we are expecting will pay for these bonds, we should keep on the good side of the medium that reaches the people of this country and brings these advertisements home to them.

Mr. RAINEY. Does the gentleman say that in these patriotic matters in order to keep on the good side of the newspapers we have got to pay them money?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The newspapers of the country can not live on patriotism alone. They have got to have something of substance. The people who sell them their print paper are not patriotic enough to give it to them. The men who furnish the ink and the type and the men who work the presses are not patriotic enough to give their material and time and services for nothing. So I say that this great Government of ours, that is spending money by billions, should not expect these papers to give their services entirely without compensation. It is not enough for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and others to say that these newspapers are dragging down millions each year by reason of the postal privilege which they now have. Most of these newspapers get nothing out of the cheap postage rates. The newspapers in my section of the country are getting nothing from that source. The newspapers that circulate mostly in the district of every Congressman here are getting nothing from that source.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not true that they circulate absolutely free in the county of publication?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and that is the end of it. But I want to say that there is a demand that this amendment pass. It is the demand of common justice.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made several times that the newspapers have not asked for the passage of this amendment. I hold in my hand several letters from the newspapers of my district, which I will ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE EVENING INDEX,
San Bernardino, Cal., August 14, 1917.

HON. WILLIAM KETTNER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KETTNER: I want to ask you, when the question of the next liberty-loan bond comes up, to do all you can to secure an appropriation for selling them by paid newspaper advertising.

There are no more generous fellows in this country than the newspaper publishers. They gave freely of their space for the first liberty loan, for the Red Cross fund, for the draft, and all the other projects that the Government has wanted put over. They have done this freely and loyally, but there is such a thing as riding a free horse to death. There are many people and many officials with the Government who think, without considering the justice of the matter at all, that newspapers should print all the stuff which is for the general good that is asked for without compensation. These people will willingly pay for printed matter, letters, circulars, postage, etc., and billboards sometimes, yet expect the newspapers to donate their publicity, into which the element of costs enters just the same.

I believe it is only right and fair that this second issue should be sold by the same means that was largely responsible for success of the first issue—newspaper publicity—but that the Government should pay for the service which is of value to, costs the publisher money.

Very truly, yours,

W. S. CONGER.

LOST HILLS GUSHER,
Lost Hills, Cal., August 15, 1917.

HON. WILLIAM KETTNER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The amount of advertising we receive from Government departments would, if published, fill our whole issue day by day.

We believe that the Government should pay for the advertising it needs the same as other business organizations do.

The only way a country newspaper can exist is by selling its advertising space.

We are, of course, patriotic to publish news and matters of assistance to the Government, but as the farmer, the steel maker, the clothier are paid for their products, so should we be; and we believe you will admit that the newspaper publisher should be paid for his product.

We hope you will indorse and help in any effort that may come before Congress to assist the newspapers to get paid for the Government advertising.

Yours, very truly,

THE LOST HILLS GUSHER,
By ORA K. HART.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the other letters be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, how many of them are there?

Mr. KETTNER. There are about 10, I believe.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California may be extended, so that he may have these letters read. The gentleman occupies very little of our time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. As my good friend from Rhode Island states, I occupy very little of the time of the House in speaking, but this is a question of vital importance to the country newspapers of this country. Some of these letters express the action of our newspaper associations on this subject.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will not the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the interest of saving time, withdraw his objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

The other letters are as follows:

THE FALLBROOK ENTERPRISE,
Fallbrook, Cal., August 10, 1917.

HON. WILLIAM KETTNER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KETTNER: You have said to me several times, "If there is anything I can do for you, call on me." Now, Mr. Kettner, there is something you can do, not only for me, but for every publisher of a country newspaper in the United States. The country newspaper has been looked upon as a free horse which the public was privileged to ride until the burden has become so great that the business has become the poorest paid of any of the professions. If the town is to be boomed, a new industry wanted, funds needed for a new church, and dozens of other things which will help all alike, the newspaper is expected to write the stuff, pay for setting the type, buy the paper, and print it, and mail it, and pay the bills.

There's no more loyal and patriotic set of American citizens to-day than the publishers of the 6,000 country newspapers in the United States. During the floating of the last liberty loan, without a murmur and without a groan, they gave millions of dollars worth of their advertising space, and many of the publishers and their families bought bonds, and they did not ask and did not receive one cent for their work, while the big city papers printed page after page for which they were paid, and the city bill posters did a thriving business.

The only thing which these 6,000 country publishers have to sell from which they derive a profit is their advertising space. With the high cost of paper and the other things which enter into the making of the ordinary country newspaper, no matter how small, with a subscription price of, say, $1.50 per year, he does not more than break even; hence it follows that the profit to run the business must come from advertising.

Now, my dear Mr. Kettner, in the floating of the next sale of liberty bonds why should we be asked to give our advertising space, which is all that we have to sell, while nobody else gives anything?

Without the aid of these 6,000 country newspapers the floating of the next issue of liberty bonds would be far short of the success that it should be. You have said to me, "If there is anything I can do for you, call on me." Now, Mr. Kettner, you are close to the administration. You have had some experience in the newspaper business, and I ask you not only on behalf of the country newspaper men of your district, but on behalf of 6,000 country newspaper men in the United States, to bring this matter before the President and the Secretary of the Treasury and ask that the country newspapers be paid for their space, the same as all other people are paid for all honest service in behalf of the Government.

Very truly, yours,

H. V. ALEXANDER.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA ASSOCIATED DAILIES,
ONTARIO, CAL., August 17, 1917.

HON. WM. KETTNER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Herewith copy of letter sent to Mr. Theodore Hardee, of the Federal reserve bank of San Francisco, in response to his request for a continuance of free publicity for Government bonds. May I ask you to read it carefully and see if you do not find the claims therein sufficient to cause you to assist the newspapers in securing the same consideration from the Government that the Government gives to others with whom it has dealings?

I shall be glad to hear from you at your convenience.

Very truly, yours,

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA ASSOCIATED DAILIES,
CROMBIE ALLEN, President.

AUGUST 13, 1917.

CHAIRMAN FEDERAL RESERVE BANK,
San Francisco, Cal.
(Attention Mr. Theodore Hardee.)

DEAR SIR: Your letters of July 30, 1917, in regard to liberty-loan publicity, addressed to the Daily Report and to the Ontario Record, received. As editor of these papers and also as president of the Southern California Associated Dailies, an organization of more than 50 daily newspapers of southern California, I am replying. What I say will refer particularly to our own papers, but I am quite confident it is equally true of all the papers in our organization.

The papers of southern California responded to the call to assist in the sale of liberty bonds as generously and as patriotically as any in the country. Take our own particular case: Our papers gave freely, day in and day out, of display space. In addition to this, we ran columns of news about the issue, carried a streamer across the top of the first page every day, ran feature stories to stimulate public interest, and also supported the issue editorially. My brother and I individually took 7 per cent money and invested it in 3½ per cent liberty bonds for ourselves and our families.

In addition, I personally toured the town, asking people to buy the bonds. I also presented the matter to the chamber of commerce, and the chamber not only indorsed the project, but each director individually subscribed. The local banks here gave splendid support to the sale.

Ontario's allotment was $60,000, but the campaign resulted in an oversubscription of more than 50 per cent, our total running close to $100,000.

After the conclusion of the campaign you wrote asking for a statement of amount of advertising, value, etc., which we have donated. I replied that we had kept no accurate account of it, but had given everything we had. Authorities on selling campaigns figure 2 to 5 per cent for advertising expenses. On a basis of $90,000 bonds sold the minimum of 2 per cent would be $1,800, the maximum of 5 per cent $4,500. So the minimum value would be $1,800, as our papers are the only ones published here.

Now, we didn't even put in a claim for $1,800 or for any amount, but if any one agency needs fair pay for services rendered in selling the bonds it is the newspaper press. I feel sure in saying the newspapers of the Nation will not allow themselves to be outdone by any agency in doing their bit to help win the war. This is a just war, and the newspapers of the Nation can be counted on to do everything in their power to help win it. And in future they will equal the generosity of any, but until the Government begins to ask munition manufacturers, railroads, and all others furnishing supplies, selling commodities, or rendering services to the Government to do so without pay, the newspapers can not be considered unpatriotic in refusing further to give away the only commodity they have for sale—space—their only source of bread and butter revenue. We have not yet heard of the Government asking the farmer or the manufacturer or anybody else but the newspaper to give his commodity free to the Government. This is not a criticism of others for getting pay for what they furnish to the Government. They are entitled to pay. All the newspaper asks is to be put on the same sound business basis.

Many imagine war a fine thing for newspapers. The war hits the newspapers harder than any other industry. It takes toll at both ends. Commercial advertising is reduced, while producing expense is increased. Everything that enters into the production of a newspaper is vastly more expensive to pay for with lessened revenue due to decreased advertising. Every extra paper sold is at a loss. It is reported that the Paper Trust, after declaring big dividends, has a surplus of over sixteen million dollars. Many newspapers are being forced to the wall, unable to pay the almost prohibitive price of paper, jumped up entirely out of proportion to the slight increase in cost of production.

In connection with the liberty bond sale I tried in vain to send either a telephone or telegraph message about it without paying. I assumed that inasmuch as the newspapers were doing everything for nothing the telephone and telegraph companies were doing likewise. Nothing doing. Likewise, even the postmaster refused to send a letter about it without being paid in advance.

The newspapers simply ask that forthcoming bond issues be advertised just as other selling campaigns are advertised; that the Government do business on a business basis, dealing with newspapers selling their only commodity—space—on the same basis they do with manufacturers, farmers and others having commodities for sale. Manufacturers simply sell their commodities to the Government for certain prices. That is all. The Government gets their commodities, the manufacturers get the Government's money. And it is all eminently right and proper it should be even so. The newspapers simply ask the Government to pay for their advertising, for the newspaper's commodity.

But with the exchange of the manufacturer's commodity for the Government's money the incident is closed, but even with paid advertising the newspaper does not cease to labor to win the war. The newspaperman does his individual bit like all other good citizens, but his paper also helps in the news and editorial columns.

I am taking the liberty of inclosing copy of resolution adopted by our association over a year ago against the free-space evil.

I shall be glad to hear from you at your convenience on this matter. Yours, to win the war,

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA ASSOCIATED DAILIES,
CROMBIE ALLEN, President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I regret that there has been any criticism of the machinery that must be used if the Government is to place an advertisement in every publication in the United States. These great advertising agencies have, in my opinion, offered their services at the cost of operation and distribution. When the gentleman from Ohio intimates that there is no cost in the work he is very much mistaken. The advertisements will be sent in the form of matrices, so that the type metal can be poured into them at the minimum of cost when they reach the town where they are to be published. The postage and express bill will be large and will be paid by the agencies. They have built up a great national advertising system, which you see used every day by the greatest business concerns of the country. If these agencies are asked to handle the publicity of the bond issue, they will make it go—make it go regularly, systematically, and successfully—cutting down other expenses, doing away with friction, and seeing that all newspapers and all advertising mediums are justly and properly treated.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that the editor of every little newspaper, as was said in the last letter read, receives every day from the Federal Government in franked envelopes more bureaucratic boosting stuff than he can open or can possibly print. There is one of the great Government extravaganzas, my friends.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman state what the newspaper advertising agency will get out of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not one agency alone but all of the national agencies. They will receive 5 to 7 per cent, for which they will render a great service. If the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that is too much, he can call in some man like John Wanamaker who knows what systematic advertising accomplishes, and authorize him to fix the agency rate at 2 per cent or 3 per cent, or whatever is absolutely fair for the cost and value of the work to be performed.

Newspapers generally, Mr. Chairman, will resent the charge made on this floor that the proposal to pay them a mere fraction of what they will earn is in the nature of a gift or gratuity. There is no robbery in the plan, there is no gift, and there is no graft. It is simply an attempt to do justice to the newspapers. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I must express surprise that this proposition of the gentleman from Washington is taken seriously by any considerable portion of the membership of this House. I want to ask every man here, to answer to himself, this question: If you vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Washington, are you really, in your opinion, voting for the interests of the Government and in the interest of the sale of these bonds, or are you voting in your own interest to please the newspapers in your section or in your district?

Mr. KETTNER. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I said you could answer it to yourself and not aloud. Now, gentlemen, I want to ask another question: Why not put in an amount here for the telegraph companies? Why not include $500,000 for sending telegrams about these bonds?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Because they receive a Government rate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why does not some friend of the railroads put in a provision including passenger fares made necessary by the sale of the bonds? Why does not some man that is a friend to the ink manufacturers and the paper manufacturers ask us to put in a separate sum for paper and ink?

Why, gentlemen, the Treasury Department must sell these bonds. It has had experience in selling bonds. The responsibility is on Mr. McAdoo and his assistants to sell these bonds and not upon us. Why do you want to specify how he shall proceed to sell the bonds?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has been suggested by a number of gentlemen, and by the gentleman from Oklahoma a moment ago, that the Secretary advocated this proposition before the committee,

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I be permitted to read one sentence from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to show that he did not advocate it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am reading from page 38. The Secretary of the Treasury says:

Some of the advertising clubs of the United States, which rendered very patriotic and effective service in the last campaign for liberty bonds, have been urging upon my attention a scheme for paid advertising. I have made no commitment about it. On the contrary, my general feeling has been that it was too expensive an operation for the Government to engage in, and I have said so to them frankly.

And yet a gentleman sitting on the floor not far from me has told me that within the last two or three days a representative of this organization came into his office and said that he came there with the acquiescence of the Secretary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. If I had the time, I would yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to suggest that the Secretary further said:

If we should engage in advertising, we should have to advertise in every paper in the United States. You can not discriminate against the newspapers. It would have to have universal application.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; you will see that he could not do it.

The Secretary further says:

The Government can not say that it thinks one newspaper is a good advertising medium and another one is a bad one, or that another one is so poor that it is not worth using. Therefore, if we engage upon an advertising campaign at all, it has got to be a very extensive one, and it would be a very expensive one at the same time.

Certainly, it would take millions and millions of dollars to engage in such an extensive campaign of advertising in all of the newspapers throughout the United States. If he advertised in one and not in another he would discriminate, and one man would object because he would say that his paper was as good as the other. The Secretary of the Treasury knows, as every business man here knows, and every man inside and outside of the House knows, that he can utilize the money that you want to expend on the newspapers to a better advantage in putting before the people the advantages of these bonds and certificates.

Gentlemen, we have sold bonds in this country for the last 50 or 60 years, and never before was it ever hinted at by any man in this House or in this Capitol that you should put in an authority to pay newspapers for advertising or pay anybody for advertising. It has always been left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury at all times to use the methods he deemed best.

The Secretary of the Treasury has had experience in selling bonds. He knows the best methods to use, to promote the interest of the Government in the sale of these bonds.

Now, let me say one thing about the little country newspaper. Why, there is not one little country newspaper with its county circulation, and the most of them are limited to county circulation, that would have the audacity to ask this Government to pay it for advertising a liberty loan through the newspapers when it knows that the Government is giving free transportation and delivery of their papers in the county to all the subscribers at the cost of millions of dollars to the Government. [Applause.]

I have in my district about as many country newspapers as most any other man has in his district, and there is not one that has ever intimated to me by letter or otherwise that the Government ought to pay for advertisements in it.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. If that were granted and advertisements sold, the editor would have to put "Adv." after it, would he not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Surely.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I think gentlemen ought not to misrepresent the Secretary. Two gentlemen have left out a part of what he said. Let me read what the Secretary said:

On the other hand, I have said I should be glad if they would give me full estimates, with specifications in each instance, as to what it would cost to make the minimum advertising campaign they have in their minds, and what it would cost for a moderate-sized campaign, and what it would cost for a maximum campaign.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the Secretary is smart enough to know that when they made their estimates for an extensive campaign it will take practically all of the money that we would allow him to sell these bonds, and he wanted to find out from them what they thought would be the cost of a moderate campaign. He is against it, and he so told them.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, my time is up.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were—ayes 27, noes 105. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 3, page 12, the word "one-seventh," and insert in lieu thereof the word "one-tenth."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 3, after the word "exceeding," strike out "one-seventh" and insert in lieu thereof "one-tenth."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, this proposition, of course, is familiar to the House. You will remember that when the last liberty loan bond bill came before us it was reported by the committee with the proposition that the Secretary should have one-fifth of 1 per cent for expenses, and the House after debate—and I do not think the committee was very enthusiastic for the proposition itself—decided that one-tenth of 1 per cent was sufficient. It seems that in selling the liberty bonds they were able to sell not two billions, but three billions of them at an expense of less than one-tenth of 1 per cent. What was sufficient then will be sufficient now or in the future, I think. In fact, the larger the amount of bonds, the less ought to be the percentage of expense, and particularly as the chairman of the committee says when this is not to be expended for advertising in the newspapers. It seems to me if we give one-tenth of 1 per cent we are giving ample for the sale. The committee naturally desires to follow the Secretary, who this time again asked for one-fifth of 1 per cent, and the committee apparently compromised between one-fifth and one-tenth and gave him one-seventh of 1 per cent. Personally, it seems to me that this whole system of expenses is wrong. I do not think we ought to give any percentage, because one-seventh of 1 per cent would give about $15,000,000 to the Secretary to expend for selling the bonds. One-tenth of 1 per cent would give him $11,000,000. It seems to me the proper way would be to simply authorize the sale of the bonds and then have the Secretary come before the committee and make estimates just as he does for every other expense, and let the Committee on Ways and Means consider it, and then appropriate what he needs instead of giving him a percentage. But the custom has been the other way, I know. The custom has been to give one-tenth of 1 per cent. The House by an emphatic vote of two to one, when the liberty bonds were before us, voted one-tenth of 1 per cent, and that proved to be sufficient, and it seems to me that we ought to follow the same practice now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman's amendment will not prevail. I do not know what it will cost to sell these bonds and I doubt whether any man in the House knows what it will cost. The Secretary of the Treasury came before us and said that he felt confident that it would cost at least one-fifth of 1 per cent to sell the bonds and war certificates. We discussed it with him; we discussed it fully among ourselves. Several members of the committee thought that one-fifth of 1 per cent was small enough.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman state the Secretary estimated one-seventh of 1 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. One-fifth of 1 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the Secretary make mention of the items?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How did he arrive at that?

Mr. KITCHIN. He said that the last $2,000,000,000 bond issue cost about $2,500,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What were the items that went into that expenditure?

Mr. KITCHIN. He only gave a general explanation of the entire expenses of selling the $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was it that caused the outlay?

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe he said the engraving of the bonds cost about $1,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What went with the other $1,500,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. For general expenses, telegrams, clerk hire, and the like.

A MEMBER. Speaking tours?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was that account itemized?

Mr. KITCHIN. He did not itemize it for us, but I know it is itemized in the department, of course.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the House ought to have an itemized statement of what went to make up that expenditure, so as to know exactly what it was.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Treasury stated he would prepare such a statement and that it would be some time before he could furnish the statement.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. DYER. Is it not a fact that a large part of the money went to pay men to go around and lecture, making speeches to theater groups and things like that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know. We can not know until we get the itemized statement.

Mr. DYER. Was not that per cent enough for the sake of advertising—

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to get to that. Of course, we all know that with a very large issue of bonds every succeeding issue of bonds will cost more to sell than the preceding issue, because they will be harder to sell. People who had money put it in the preceding issue. In the future money will be harder to get and there will not be so much demand for the bonds. Therefore, there will have to be more effort put forth, and besides, there will be two, three, or four campaigns now to sell $7,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. GILLET. Does not the gentleman think the educational work which was done in the first issue will help all the others?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not desire to speak on this amendment, but I wish to get some information for the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. Go ahead.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The first bond bill asked for $12,000,000 in round figures to promote that loan.

Mr. KITCHIN. It asked for one-fifth of 1 per cent to sell the bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent to sell the certificates of indebtedness, which amounted to—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. About $12,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. About $12,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And when the bill came into the House and was finally enacted into law it was cut down to $7,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, it was cut down to one-tenth of 1 per cent on the bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent on the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In placing $2,000,000,000 of liberty loan bonds, which the Secretary has done, he spent of the $7,000,000 allotted to him in that bond bill a total of $2,568,167.27.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is, he expended $500,000 more than the one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In order to sell $2,000,000,000 of bonds with an authorized allowance of $7,000,000 he spent $2,568,167.27. I think these facts ought to be known to the Members and go into the RECORD.

The Secretary, in his statement to the committee, said:

The total of the actual expenditures thus far returned on the liberty loan is $2,568,167.27.

Now, the present bill as presented to the House proposed by the one-tenth and the one-fifth per cent rates to allow the Secretary $23,000,000 to carry the new or second loan. That was cut down in the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. In round numbers, $17,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the bill now actually carries an allowance to the Secretary of about $17,500,000 for the new loan?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that covers in the balance of the $7,000,000, as I understand it, allowed under the first loan act?

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not catch the last inquiry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The $17,500,000 which this bill now proposes to allow includes the balance over $2,500,000 already spent? Am I right about that?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. It is just one-seventh of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and war-saving certificates he should sell.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He still has available under the old act $4,500,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. But $3,000,000 of that has been merged into this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman misunderstood my question. That $4,500,000 he still has in hand to place the balance of the liberty loan will be included in the allowance now made to him, which totals about $17,500,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know whether it will be included or not, but he can not have over that $17,500,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is so—

Mr. KITCHIN. He would turn it over into the Treasury. He can not expend both funds. He can not expend that $4,500,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All he will have to spend for placing whatever is left of the old loan, and for promoting the new loan, will be this total of $17,500,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] would cut the total of $17,500,000 down to about $11,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Eleven or twelve million.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the effect of the passage of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be to reduce the amount allowed to the Secretary for floating the loan from $17,500,000 to $11,500,000, which would be a saving of $6,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania ever seen or heard of a statement as to whether or for what purposes, in detail, the $2,500,000 was expended?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from North Carolina will permit me in his time, I will read from the testimony:

Secretary McAdoo. Let me say this with reference to the estimate of the actual cost of floating the first liberty loan. I have felt I would rather make this statement when we get the full and complete figures, and, by the way, let me say that all these figures are subject to audit and open to Congress at any time. There is no concealment about it. The Senate put on an amendment which provided that I should make special report of the expenditures to each session of the Congress. I make that anyway. There is no concealment about it. The whole thing is wide open, and even if it were not, the Congress has the power at any time to send down a committee and investigate the whole thing.

The total of the actual expenditures thus far returned on the liberty loan is $2,568,167.27. I state that, subject to proper correction when the full returns are in. I am satisfied that the first liberty loan cost actually much more than one-fifth of 1 per cent to be placed. If it had not been for the patriotic people of this country who put up their own money and time we never could have done it for one-fifth of 1 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any member of the committee that heard that statement ask for a statement in order to find out what the items were?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; we asked and were told of the volunteer services of banks, bankers' and brokers' offices, newspapers, and so forth.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Volunteer services are not an expenditure out of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We were told of other agencies which the Secretary employed and which volunteered their services to him to place the first liberty loan. And he said he thought the time had come when, instead of having them do this work free and at their own expense, they should be compensated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that anyone who volunteered his services did not get any of the $2,500,000 of money out of the Treasury, and that does not answer the question at all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SIMS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes. They have taken up all the time. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, gentlemen, here is the situation: I want every man in the House to hear it. Then he can vote according to his own judgment.

We do not know whether or not it is going to cost a great deal more to make the campaign for the flotation of this new issue of bonds. In all probability the percentage of expense connected with this campaign to sell $7,000,000,000 of bonds will be a great deal more than in the case of the first bond issue. In my judgment it will require at least three campaigns to make the new issue instead of but one. I do not believe there is a man in this House who is not convinced that the last issue of $2,000,000,000 of bonds sold was floated at the very lowest expense possible. I have heard no complaint from anybody of extravagance concerning those $2,000,000,000 of bonds.

My judgment, and I think the judgment of every common-sense man in the House, is that it will cost more in proportion to the amount of bonds sold to make the campaign for this new issue than it cost to make the last campaign.

Now, what did it cost in the last campaign? It cost more than one-eighth of 1 per cent. Now, do you want to further reduce the appropriation for the sale of bonds when we know it is going to cost more in the future? The Secretary of the Treasury thinks he can not possibly get along with less than one-fifth of 1 per cent.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. If it cost more than one-tenth to float the first issue, where did he get his money?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you about that. There was $5,000,000 appropriated for the sale of the bonds provided for in section 1 of the act of April 24, 1917. Besides that there was the appropriation for the sale of the certificates of indebtedness. I do not believe that there is a man here who thinks that the Secretary of the Treasury can get along and defray the cost of the next issue and the campaign that will be necessary to float it, and the next campaign after that, and the next after that, to sell the $7,000,000,000 of bonds at a less cost than was required to sell the $2,000,000,000 issue, and we are making him a less allowance to sell this $7,000,000,000 issue than it cost to sell the $2,000,000,000 issue. It ought not to be less. The committee cut it down from one-fifth to one-seventh. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 77.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 12, line 9, after the word "direct," insert:

"Provided, That the amount that may be expended for expenses for each of said class of obligations shall not exceed the per cent herein stated for each total issue of said bonds, war-saving certificates, and certificates of indebtedness herein authorized."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to come in on page 12, line 2, after the word "act," to insert the words "except under section 12."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILLETT: On page 12, line 2, after the word "act," insert the following: "except under section 12."

Mr. GILLETT. I think the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will accept that.

Mr. KITCHIN. That ought to go in. We will accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That bonds shall not be issued under authority of sections 1 and 4 of said act approved April 24, 1917, in addition to the $2,000,000,000 thereof heretofore issued or offered for subscription, but bonds shall be issued from time to time upon the interchange of such bonds of different denominations and of coupon and registered bonds and upon the transfer of registered bonds, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and, if and to the extent that the privilege of conversion provided for in such bonds shall arise and shall be exercised, in accordance with such provision for such conversion. No bonds shall be issued under authority of the several sections of acts and of the resolution mentioned in said section 4 of the act approved April 24, 1917; but bonds herein authorized may be used for purposes mentioned in said section 4 of the act of April 24, 1917, and as set forth in the acts therein enumerated.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think the word "said" in line 16 should be "the"? There is no act referred to in this section.

Mr. KITCHIN. But it has been referred to in several preceding sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized during the war, whenever it shall appear that the public interests require that any of the accounts of the Military Establishment be audited at any place other than the seat of Government, to direct the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Auditor for the War Department to exercise, either in person or through assistants, the powers and perform the duties of their offices at any place or places away from the seat of Government in the manner that is or may be required by law at the seat of Government and in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(a) That when the Secretary of the Treasury shall exercise the authority herein referred to, the powers and duties of the said comptroller and auditor, under and pursuant to the provisions of the act of July 31, 1894, and all other laws conferring jurisdiction upon those officers, shall be exercised and performed in the same manner as nearly as practicable and with the same effect away from the seat of Government as they are now exercised and performed and have effect at the seat of Government, and decisions authorized by law to be rendered by the comptroller at the request of disbursing officers may be rendered with the same effect by such assistants as may be authorized by him to perform that duty.

(b) That when pursuant to this section the said comptroller and auditor shall perform their duties at a place in a foreign country, the balances arising upon the settlement of accounts and claims of the Military Establishment shall be certified by the auditor to the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants of the Treasury Department as now provided for the certification of balances by said auditor in Washington, and the balances so found due shall be final and conclusive upon all branches of the Government, except that any person whose account has been settled or the commanding officer of the Army abroad, or the comptroller may obtain a revision of such settlement by the comptroller upon application therefor within three months, the decision to be likewise final and conclusive and the differences arising upon such revision to be certified to and stated by the auditor as now provided by law: Provided, That certificates of balances due may be transmitted to and paid by the proper disbursing officer abroad instead of by warrant: Provided further, That any person whose account has been settled, or the Secretary of War, may obtain a reopening and review of any settlement made pursuant to this section upon application to the Comptroller of the Treasury in Washington within one year after the close of the war, and the action of the comptroller thereon shall be final and conclusive in the same manner as herein provided in the case of a balance found due by the auditor.

(d) That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint upon the nomination of the comptroller and auditor an assistant to each and fix their compensation, and to designate from among the persons to be employed hereunder one or more to act in the absence or disability of such assistant comptroller and assistant auditor. He shall also prescribe the number and maximum compensation to be paid to agents, accountants, clerks, translators, interpreters, and other persons who may be employed in the work under this section by the comptroller and auditor. The assistant comptroller and assistant auditor shall have full power to perform in a foreign country all the duties with reference to the settlement there of the accounts of the Military Establishment that the comptroller and auditor now have at the seat of government and in foreign countries under the provisions of this section, and shall perform such duties in accordance with the instructions received from and rules and regulations made by the comptroller and auditor. Such persons as are residing in a foreign country when first employed hereunder shall not be required to take an oath of office or be required to be employed pursuant to the laws, rules, and regulations relating to the classified civil service, nor shall they be reimbursed for subsistence expenses at their post of duty or for expenses in traveling to or from the United States.

(e) That it shall be the duty of all contracting, purchasing, and disbursing officers to allow any representative of the comptroller or auditor to examine all books, records, and papers in any way connected with the receipt, disbursement, or disposal of public money, and to render such accounts and at such times as may be required by the comptroller. All contracts connected with accounts to be settled by the auditor abroad shall be filed in his office there.

(f) That any person appointed or employed under the provisions of this section who at the time is in the service of the United States shall, upon termination of his services hereunder, be restored to the position held by him at the time of such employment. No provision of existing law shall be construed to prevent the payment of money appropriated for the salary of any Government officer or employee at the seat of government who may be detailed to perform duty under this section outside the District of Columbia, and such details are hereby authorized.

(g) That for the payment of the expenses in carrying into effect this section, including traveling expenses, per diem of $4 in lieu of subsistence for officers and employees absent from Washington, rent, cablegrams and telegrams, printing, law books, books of reference, periodicals, stationery, office equipment and exchange thereof, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000, of which not exceeding $25,000 may be expended at Washington for the purposes of this section, but no officer or employee shall receive for duty in Washington any compensation other than his regular salary.

(b) That the Secretary of the Treasury may designate not more than two persons employed hereunder to act as special disbursing agents of the appropriation herein, to serve under the direction of the comptroller, and their accounts shall be rendered to and settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury in Washington. All persons employed under this section shall perform such additional duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

(i) That the comptroller and the auditor, and such persons as may be authorized in writing by either of them, may administer oaths to American citizens in respect to any matter within the jurisdiction of either of said officers and certify the official character, when known, of any foreign officer whose jurat or certificate may be necessary on any paper to be filed with them.

(j) That persons engaged in work abroad under the provisions of this section may purchase from Army stores for cash and at cost price for their own use such articles or stores as may be sold to officers and enlisted men.

(k) That the authority granted under this section shall terminate six months after the close of the war or at such earlier date as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, and it shall be the duty of the comptroller and auditor to make such reports as the Secretary of the Treasury may require of the expenditures made and work done pursuant to this section, and such reports shall be transmitted to the Congress at such time as he may decide to be compatible with the public interest.

(l) No officers, employees, or agents appointed or employed under this section shall receive more salary or compensation than like officers, employees, or agents of the Government now receive.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina whether establishing agencies abroad as herein proposed is not an entirely new departure in this country?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is an entirely new departure, and it is also a new departure for this Government to send troops to the old country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This section provides for offices, headquarters, depositories, and things of that kind, abroad. Is the gentleman satisfied that there is no constitutional objection to it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is any constitutional objection to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The matter has been inquired into, has it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in line 17, on page 13, in the copy of the bill which I have, there is a typographical error, the first "e" being omitted from the word "required."

Mr. KITCHIN. It is correct in the original print, but if the error appears in the copy which the clerk has, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk be allowed to correct the typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 15, after the word "appropriated" insert "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918."

Mr. GILLET. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee that unless those words are inserted this appropriation will be a continuing one.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no objection to that amendment. We accept it. It might be construed as a continuing appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, we ask to return to section 7, so that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may offer his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment with the statement that it has been agreed to by various gentlemen who criticized the amendment that I offered. I think this renders it more certain, if there was any doubt about the amendment that I offered before.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A substitute for the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the former amendment and accept this one and now offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 10, line 14, after the word "corporations" and the period, insert the following:

"For the purposes of this act the interest on an amount of such bonds and certificates, the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from the taxes provided for in subdivision (b) of this section."

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Tennessee: Page 10, line 14, strike out the period and insert a comma after the word "corporations" and insert the following: "but in computing incomes for the purpose of such additional income tax, each individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall be allowed a deduction of such interest to the amount of $200."

Mr. CANNON. I think that amounts to the same thing. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it does not?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The substitute allows the exemption of income instead of the exemption of principal.

Mr. KITCHIN. We want to make this a popular loan. It is just a matter of computation as to the difference between the two amendments.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire the floor now?

Mr. CANNON. No. I shall be glad to hear the gentleman explain his amendment.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The exemptions to taxpayers are exemptions of the income and not exemptions of principal. Each individual is allowed an exemption of three or four thousand dollars of income according to whether single or married. It is a different proposition from allowing a farmer $3,000 exemption on the value of his farm or a manufacturer $3,000 exemption on the value of his plant. In other words, these bonds and certificates may bear different rates of interest. The present certificates bear 3½ per cent, whereas the bonds authorized in this bill are to bear 4 per cent. That would allow the holders of these different pieces of paper in one case a $400 exemption and in another case a $350 exemption. I merely make the suggestion contained in the amendment as being in line with all exemptions of income-tax laws, and that is that the exemption ought to apply to income instead of to the principal, because incomes from different kinds of principal are very different, and exemptions that would result would not be equitable. That is my only purpose in offering the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee misconstrues this bill and the act of April 24, 1917. If he is correct about it, it should be as he says. In other words, if as he says there would be a 3½ per cent bond subject to the supertax, and other bonds authorized in this act of 4 per cent, and if you have an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois that one bondholder holding 3½ per cent bonds will have an exemption of an income of $350 on $10,000, and a man with a 4 per cent bond will have an exemption of $400 on a $10,000 bond, I say that is incorrect. There could not be but one bond by this act, and that is a bond of 4 per cent. The 3½ per cent bonds could never be subject to the supertax because they were issued under the act of April 24, 1917, in which it is said that they shall be exempt from all taxes except State and inheritance taxes. Two billion dollars of that issue can never be subjected to a surtax because there is a covenant with the holder that those bonds unless converted shall be exempt from all taxes except State and inheritance taxes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. At the conclusion of the war we will have a debt of twenty-five or thirty billion dollars in the form of bonds. Those bonds can not be refunded into lower rates all at one time. That would be impossible.

Mr. KITCHIN. They could not be refunded unless the holders of the bonds agreed to it. The holder of the bond can agree to anything. You do not need anything to protect him if he has the option to agree to it or not as he sees fit.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I am offering the matter in the way of suggestion. We would have large classes of bondholders getting war rates of interest from unrefunded bonds, and those that had been refunded into lower rates would be entitled to smaller exemptions under this provision. Not only that, but during the course of the war we may have different kinds of paper, short-term paper subject to supertax, and it would bring about different exemptions for each holder.

Mr. KITCHIN. If there should be after this act a bond act of 4½ per cent, it is still for the holder of the bond issued under this act to say whether he wants them converted. It is at the option of the holder. I do not imagine that anyone would ever consent to convert a 4 per cent bond subject to a supertax into a 3½ per cent bond subject to a supertax; but Congress might pass an act afterwards saying that you could convert the 4 per cent bond subject to supertax into a 3 per cent bond exempt from supertax. The whole amendment is a kind of policy designed to make the loan popular with the people. There is not a bond that can be issued that will be subject to supertax.

and excess-profits tax under this act except the 4 per cent bond. It says so in the act. It says:

That none of the bonds authorized by section 1, nor of the certificates authorized by section 1, or by section 6, of this act, shall bear the circulation privilege. All such bonds and certificates shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes and (b) graduated additional income taxes.

I think that, to make this a popular loan, we should have it plainly expressed right in the act that $5,000 of these bonds issued under this act shall be exempt.

"I can buy $5,000 of these bonds and they will never be subject to supertaxes." They will not understand that under Judge HULL's amendment. They will have to figure it out, because he says the interest shall be computed upon such and such a basis.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Does not every income-tax payer in the country understand that he has a $3,000 exemption or a $4,000 exemption?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; he does not understand that. He understands that Congress may make the normal tax hereafter 2 per cent or 3 per cent or 5 per cent or 10 per cent, and it can make the exemptions hereafter $4,000 or $5,000 or $100 or $500 or $1,000.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I am speaking of the present law.

Mr. KITCHIN. The present law is going to be changed by the pending revenue bill. I think the gentleman has misconstrued the amendment by considering the  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent bonds issued under the act of April 24, 1917, in connection with this act.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Does not every exemption provision in the income-tax law up to this minute relate to exemptions of income and not principal?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is all I am asking this amendment to do.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will amount to the identical thing. There is not any difference. Under the gentleman's amendment he says that not more than $200 interest shall be computed, and so forth, and you get exactly the same results; but what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and what gentlemen who desire to accept this amendment want, and the purpose of the amendment, is to put in black and white in the act a provision to the effect that there is an exemption of $5,000, so that everybody can understand what it is—that $5,000 worth of these bonds are always to be exempted.

Mr. CANNON. And that the exemption can not be changed by future legislation.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the substitute.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the substitute offered by Mr. HULL of Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FITZGERALD having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SIMS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5901 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to that committee to report it forthwith to the House with the following amendment: Add, at the end of the bill, the following new section:

"Sec. 13. That a joint select committee shall be appointed, consisting of six Senators, to be named by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and seven Members of the House, to be named by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to cooperate with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the loan and expenditure of money authorized for the national security and defense. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress, shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury on any or all matters relating to such expenditures, and shall make report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress. Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical expert and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not germane.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the point of order that the proposed motion is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to argue the point of order further than to say that this amendment conforms in form and substance to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the District of Columbia appropriation bill when the half-and-half question was before the House, and that the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] held that amendment to be germane.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say, Mr. Speaker, we thrashed this same question out in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Chair held that very amendment out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So that there may be no misunderstanding in the future as to the ruling of the Chair, the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is strictly accurate in his assertion that in form the amendment corresponds to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the District appropriation bill some years ago. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, however, was an amendment to a Senate amendment which was pending to a bill which originated in the House, and the same rule is not applicable in determining the question of germaneness under such circumstances as is applicable under existing circumstances.

Under the rules of the House motions to recommit with instructions must be germane and the proposed instructions must be of such a character that if proposed as an amendment to the bill would be in order as an amendment. The Chair is not taken entirely unawares in making the statement about this motion. He was informed that he would be requested to take the Speaker's place because of his unavoidable absence, and the proposed amendment and authorities were submitted to him for an opportunity to give them careful examination. The rule of germaneness is very well established. It is so well established that it is only necessary for the Chair to read the title of the bill. It is:

A bill to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

The present occupant of the chair, under date of September 22, 1914, made an elaborate ruling on the question of germaneness. Repeating a part of that—

That an amendment be germane means that it must be akin to or relevant to the subject matter of the bill. It must be an amendment that would appropriately be considered in connection with the bill. The object of the rule requiring amendments to be germane—and such a rule has been adopted in practically every legislative body in the United States—is in the interest of orderly legislation. Its purpose is to prevent hasty and ill-considered legislation, to prevent propositions being presented for the consideration of the body which might not reasonably be anticipated and for which the body might not be properly prepared.

It seems to the Chair that, applying these tests—and these words seem to fit peculiarly into the pending circumstances—to determine if an amendment is germane, the question to be answered is whether the amendment is relevant, appropriate, and in a natural and logical sequence to the subject matter of the bill. The Chair is quite clear that the proposed motion does not conform to any one of the tests that the present occupant indicated were required to be applied to such motion. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was unanimously passed.

On motion of Mr. KIRCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL (H. REPT. NO. 137).

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report a bill making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies, and so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves all points of order, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

ARMY AND NAVY INSURANCE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. ALEXANDER. To ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a supplemental report and the minority views on the Army and Navy compensation and insurance bill (H. R. 5723).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following are the report and minority views referred to:

[H. Rept. No. 130, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, having considered the same report thereon with amendments and as so amended recommend that it pass.

The bill as amended has the approval of the Treasury Department, as will appear by the letter attached and which is made a part of this report.

Amend the bill as follows:

Page 7, lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, strike out the following: "That for the purpose of this act marriage shall be conclusively presumed, in the absence of proof, that there is a legal spouse living, if the man and woman have lived together in the openly acknowledged relation of husband and wife during the two years immediately preceding the date of the declaration of war, or the date of enlistment or of entrance into or employment in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States if subsequent to such declaration or during the two years immediately preceding the man's death or the beginning of the disability."

Page 8, line 18, after the word "or," insert the words "of any age."

Page 8, line 20, strike out the words "of any age."

Page 11, line 8, after the word "divorced," insert the words "and who has not remarried."

Page 17, line 5, after the word "service," insert the words "in the line of duty."

Page 17, line 11, after the word "if," insert the words "from a marriage contracted before injury."

Page 18, lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "two years after her remarriage or until" and add after the word "death" the words "or remarriage."

Page 27, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "the opportunity to secure upon equitable terms."

Page 27, line 24, strike out the words "or broader."

Page 28, line 4, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$5,000."

Page 29, lines 20, 21, and 22, strike out the words "rights and privileges not provided for may be granted from time to time as may be prescribed by regulations."

The bill has the approval of the Treasury Department, as will appear by the letter from the Secretary attached hereto and made a part of this report.

The first part of the bill limits the existing law in all its aspects to marine insurance only. The balance of the bill by way of amendment to existing law adds four provisions:

First. All soldiers are required under regulations to be prescribed to allot to their families a definite part of their salaries, to be fixed in each case according to circumstances, but not to be less in any case than $15 per month.

Second. The bill provides that the United States shall pay to dependent families of soldiers amounts equal to allotments made by the soldiers.

Third. The bill provides a full table and schedule of compensation for injuries after the manner of other compensation laws for similar cases. The bill provides specifically the compensation in each case, whether for death or complete or partial disability or loss of a particular member of the body. All of this is fixed and compulsory.

But the fourth provision is made at the option of the soldier who takes insurance from the Bureau of Insurance in the Treasury Department in multiples of $500, but not to exceed $10,000 for each soldier.

This insurance is to be sold to the soldiers at normal rates of actual cost which he would pay if he were not a soldier. In this way he can not only secure insurance from the Government but can secure it at a proper rate. Existing insurance companies charge prohibitive rates for war risks. While they recognize $8 a thousand as a normal rate for a man 21 years old, they add an additional $50 a thousand for a war risk, making the lowest rate for a soldier by private insurance $58 a thousand. In the next place it is term insurance, which ends with the period unless renewed, but may be renewed at the option of the soldier until the end of the war, when it may be converted into some other form of insurance. This is provided for because the soldier may be considerably older at the end of the war, his health may be impaired, and if so it would be difficult and expensive for him to secure insurance from a private company. We feel that it is right for the Government to make restitution, as far as possible, by giving him the same benefits as to insurance which he would have enjoyed if he had never served his country in the war. An advantage to the soldiers and their families carried by this bill is that the benefits to be paid are not to be paid in a lump sum to be squandered or lost in unfortunate investment, but will be paid in installments so as to afford the greatest benefits.

Another valuable feature of the bill is that if during the first 120 days after enlistment the soldier should fail to take insurance, and die, he will be considered as insured and the benefits of such insurance will go to his family.

Your committee thinks this bill wise and beneficent in all its features, and though a radical departure in some respects, thinks it will prove a great blessing to our soldiers and their families and be very satisfactory to the country.

The first, second, and third features provide for the maintenance of the families of the soldiers during service and for compensation in case of death, and it is believed this is effected much more satisfactorily in this bill than in the existing pension system and will not be so expensive in the long run. The elements of certainty and security afford an incentive to the soldier to go forward confident of protection by the Government to themselves and their families and go far to mitigate the anguish of the families themselves during the unhappy separation from the soldiers.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, August 24, 1917.

HON. W. C. ADAMSON,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

MY DEAR JUDGE ADAMSON: Complying with your request for the views of this department on H. R. 5723, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," the bill has my unqualified approval, and I attach hereto a letter I addressed to the President on July 31, 1917, outlining the general features of the bill you have under consideration, and also a copy of a letter from the President, dated August 7, 1917, in which he expresses his entire approval of the measure.

May I not again express my sincere and earnest conviction that no more important measure than this one is now pending in the Congress? We ought not to leave the officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy, who must fight in this great war, to the uncertain chance of future legislation upon the old and discredited pension plan. By providing now a comprehensive measure like the present one, based upon the best compensation laws and practices of the different States and of the Nation, providing definite allowances in case of death and total or partial permanent disability, and for the support of the dependent families of the men who go to the front, so that they shall not become objects of charity while the men are away fighting for their country, and by giving the men the right to buy a reasonable amount of insurance from the Government on a peace basis so that all who desire can supplement the provisions made by the Government with the additional benefits which flow from this life insurance feature, we shall have told every man who enters the service of his country in advance what he may expect in every contingency, not only for his family but for himself.

This scientific, well-balanced, equitable, and comprehensive insurance and compensation measure will be a substitute, or should be a substitute, for the pension system as applied to the present war, and ought to make impossible, as it certainly will make unnecessary, future pension legislation, with all of its inequalities and favoritism.

Those who are enjoying pensions under the present system are left undisturbed; this measure does not affect them. We do not want to deprive any old soldier of any part of the recognition which his country has already given him for valorous services rendered in the past, but we do want to make certain for the future that a more equitable and just system than the old pension system shall be provided for all those who enter the military and naval service of the country in this war.

I am most grateful to you and to the members of your committee for the opportunity you have given me to express my earnest approval of this measure.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. G. McADOO.

[H. Rept. No. 130, pt. 3, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following supplemental report:

A fuller analysis of this bill and of the principles underlying it than has been given in the original report is now presented in this supplementary report.

The object of the bill is to provide the military and naval forces of the country a reasonable measure of indemnity against the risks incurred and the losses sustained by reason of their service.

The family, not the man, is taken as the unit, because, especially under the draft law, the loss to the man is in fact a loss to his family. Proceeding in logical order, the first loss is that incurred by reason of the service itself—the loss of the ordinary income due to taking the man from his civil occupation and compelling him to engage in military service. The pay provided for the soldier and sailor is, of course, some compensation for this, but it is inadequate to enable men with families properly to maintain them. He himself receives board, lodging, and clothing in addition to the money, but he must continue to maintain his family.

The bill recognizes this primary obligation of the men and enforces it by compelling him to allot not less than $15 and not more than one-half of his pay to the support of wife and child. Recognizing, however, that this is inadequate and believing it to be the duty of the Government to see that the families of our heroes do not become objects of charity, but receive at least a decent support, the bill provides that the Government shall supplement the compulsory allotment to be made by the man himself. This Government allowance is based upon the size of the family.

Allotments for grandchildren, parents, brothers, and sisters are not compulsory, but if these relatives are actually dependent upon the man, he can secure a Government allowance for them if he himself will make an allotment of pay to them. If he is already allotting to wife or child, the additional allotment will be not less than $5, or more than one-seventh of his pay. If, however, he is not allotting to wife or child, then the allotment to these relatives must equal that required for wife or child in order to secure the Government allowance. The Government allowance to these relatives added to the allotment to be made by the man will not exceed the amount habitually contributed by him for their support for a year past.

The total allowance to be made by the Government, whether to wife, child, or other dependents, can not exceed $50 per month.

Subject to regulations by the Secretary of War or of the Navy, respectively, a man may allot any part of his pay for other purposes, but so much of one-half of the pay as is not allotted, either for dependents or for other purposes, may be required to be deposited with the Government at 4 per cent compound interest if the Secretary of War or of the Navy, respectively, shall so order.

The purpose of this compulsory deposit provision is to enable the heads of the War and Navy Departments, respectively, to secure a better morale in the service, if they should find it advisable so to do. The full pay now received by the private in foreign service, $33 per month, is deemed by military authorities as entirely too much for spending purposes under the present conditions in Europe. The difference in spending money between those who are compelled to make allotments and the others, as well as between the American forces and the armies of other nations, may affect the morale of the armies. The power to compel these deposits is deemed essential by the commanding officers.

These provisions for allotment and allowances form the subject matter of article 2 of the bill, and are confined to the enlisted man.

The second risk indemnified against is that of loss of life or limb. This forms the subject matter of the present pension legislation and legislation giving gratuities of a half year's or a year's pay in case of death in the service.

The bill proceeds upon a new basis. It follows the analogy of the workmen's compensation acts. It deals with the soldier and the sailor as a military employee of the Government. It offers not a gratuity in the shape of a pension, but a compensation if in the course of the service he suffer injury or contract disease.

Pensions, especially since the day of service-pension legislation, have come to be looked upon as Government charity, and the present pension legislation is both inadequate and unjust. It is of the utmost importance both for the practical results and for the psychological effect upon the men, their families, and the people of the country, that a new point of view be established. This is accomplished by following the analogy of the workmen's compensation acts, by designating the payments to them as compensation and not as pensions, and by separating the administration of this law absolutely and completely from the administration of the pension laws. The pension legislation is not repealed; the old soldiers and their families are not affected by the bill; it applies only to those now in or hereafter entering the service. For them this bill is a substitute for the pensions and gratuities.

Here again, however, the family and not the individual is the unit, and a step forward, even in advance of the workmen's compensation acts, is taken. Compensation is based upon rank and pay, but with a fixed minimum for total disability of from $40 to $75 per month, dependent upon the size of the family, with an addition up to $20 per month if the constant services of a nurse or attendant is required, and a further $10 if the man has a widowed mother dependent upon him. The maximum for the highest officer is $200 a month.

So, too, for the widow and child the compensation is based on rank and pay of the deceased, but with a maximum of $200 and a minimum ranging from $15 for a single child, $30 for a widow, up to $60 for a wife and four children, and with provision for a maximum of $25 to a widowed mother if the $60 be not required for wife and children.

Under the pension laws $100 per month is paid for certain total disabilities, regardless of whether a man is a bachelor or has a family. On the other hand, the widow receives but $12 a month, with $2 added for each child. These provisions are entirely unjust and inconsistent. One hundred dollars per month for a bachelor is too much.

The compensation for partial disabilities is based upon the reduction in earning capacity caused by similar injuries in civil occupations. This is to be determined by experience, and is to be fixed by general regulations from time to time.

The Government, however, owes a higher duty, both to the injured man and to the people, than merely to compensate him for his injuries. Its primary obligation is to develop all of his potentialities, to fit him for the best in life of which he is capable. Every European country is now making provision for the reeducation and rehabilitation of its soldiers and sailors, and some of them have long since made provision for those injured in civil occupations. At present Government officials are studying the experience of these nations with a view to future legislation on this most important subject. The present bill lays down, however, two fundamental fiscal propositions: First, that if the man be found capable of reeducation, he shall be compelled to take a proper course when offered to him, under penalty of suspension of his compensation; second, if, however, through this reeducation he shall gain a better economic position, he shall not thereby be deprived of his compensation. If a man has lost his legs, they can not be restored; payment is made for the loss; but it is in the common interest that these fighting men, crippled though they be, should not rest content to live on the minimum compensation which the Government gives. They of all men should be encouraged to lift themselves above the common level and to develop all of their latent powers.

The next loss to be indemnified against is that of present insurability, and this is compensated for in the bill by selling Government insurance to those who but for the war could buy similar insurance from private companies.

Any young man physically fit to enter the Army can protect himself and his family, present or future, by insurance against death or total disability, but if he enters the Army by this very patriotic service he is deprived for all practical purposes of this right, inasmuch as the additional rates ranging from $37.50 to $100 per thousand, that private companies charge, are absolutely prohibitive. Purely as a matter of justice the Government should make this loss good by compensation in kind; that is, by issuing its own insurance. This, however, is but one of many justifications for article 4 of the bill.

Articles 3 and 4 are to be dealt with together. While the Government can fairly give only a minimum of compensation based upon general conditions throughout the land, it must recognize that men ought not to be content with this minimum; that they ought, with true American foresight and self-reliance, to procure additional protection for themselves and their families in case they become disabled or die through injuries received in the service.

Furthermore, article 3 gives compensation, in case of death, only to the wife, child, or widowed mother. A man may have others dependent upon him, both during his disability and after his death. Their claims may be absolutely just, but to open the door to them, as is done in many workmen's compensation acts, would greatly increase the administrative machinery as well as the possibilities of fraud. If protection for them can be otherwise secured, it would be much better. This protection can be obtained through the insurance. A man is thereby enabled both to secure for wife and child something more than the Government minimum compensation and also to obtain something for his other dependents.

Those who have opposed article 4 concede that it is practically impossible for these men to obtain insurance in private companies. They urge, however, first, that most of them would not think of taking insurance unless unduly stimulated thereto; second, if they took insurance the amount taken may be measured by the fact that the average American policy is about $1,800; third, that if the compensation provided for in article 3 is inadequate, it should be increased, and if some specific compensation should be paid for death, the lump sum of $1,000 or $2,000, or even more, should be given to everyone who dies within five years after the war.

That many who ought to protect themselves fail to do so is, however, no reason why the Government, when it deprives those who would insure themselves of the opportunity to get this insurance, should refuse to make good that loss. Moreover, if such insurance is, as we believe it to be, in the interest of the man, his family, and the country, it is the duty of the country, especially to this particular class, to urge them to obtain this protection.

As to the amount, while the bill itself provides for a maximum of $10,000, the committee has reported an amendment reducing this to $5,000. The bill in its original form had the full approval both of Secretary McAdoo and of the President, and since the original report was submitted the President has reiterated his views in favor of $10,000 insurance.

This insurance will be payable only in installments: Five thousand dollars would yield between $25 and $30 a month over a period of 20 years; $10,000 double that amount. The average American policy of $1,800 when spread out in such monthly installments is totally inadequate for any real protection; it should be no measure of the Government insurance to be offered to the soldiers and sailors.

This insurance will enable many a man who, had he remained in civil life, would have prospered and who by reason of his military career has been reduced to the Government compensation, to secure some additional comforts and to give his children the care, maintenance, and education that they would have received had he not entered the military service.

But to confine the insurance to death within five years after the war would be to frustrate one of the principal objects of this article. That object is to enable the men in military service, by their own efforts and self-denial, to protect themselves against the consequences of old age or of disability or death not caused by their military service. In other words, it is a substitute for the service pension.

While no Congress can tie the hands of its successor, while no measure that we now take can prevent future service-pension legislation, we can, nevertheless, erect a certain moral barrier. If we now fail to help these men help themselves, we shall have no answer to the clamorous demands that are sure to come for service pensions similar to those granted to the Civil War veterans. They are pure gratuities. As such, in the minds of many, they have completely changed the character of a pension. But the failure of our predecessors to take proper action at the proper time made service-pension legislation a certainty.

We shall preserve American ideals and sustain the self-respect of our fighting youth if we offer them in place of either present or future gratuities a real opportunity to purchase for themselves the protection that they may deem essential for their families. But this protection must be real; it must cover death or disability at any time, not merely within five years after the war. The insurance must mature, if the insured so desires, when he reaches a certain age, as well as by death or total disability. Speculation in the insurance must not be permitted; it must be unassignable and free from the claims of creditors, both of the insured and of the beneficiary. It must not be payable to any and every one, but only to a limited class of relatives. The bill contains all of these provisions.

Clearly the Government should bear the cost due to the increased mortality that the war will produce. Furthermore, the Government should administer this insurance for its soldiers and sailors as a governmental function, without charge to the insured for the mere administration. The Government will have no expenses for commissions, medical examinations, taxation, advertising, and investment. The premium rates, therefore, to be charged for the insurance should be the net rates without any addition or loading such as is made by private insurance companies to cover expenses. They should be based upon the ordinary mortality experience in peace times. These are the provisions of the bill.

It has been urged by some that while the Government must of course keep up the insurance after the war for those who are then uninsurable, it should not keep it up for those who at the time can pass a medical examination in a reputable company. The bill, however, very properly contemplates that if the insurance is taken within the limited period of 120 days, during which a man must make up his mind whether or not he desires to obtain this protection, it may be kept up after the war even though the insured be healthy and return to civil life. This is but just, for many reasons: First, Private insurance companies will not take him now, the Government, therefore, must give the insurance. The only real insurance, however, is that which can be continued for life, not that which may be terminated by the insurance companies at a given period. Second, The Government owes a special duty to those whom it has led to take insurance. If it discontinues the insurance after the war for those who have come through unscathed, it subjects them to the heavier charges that the private companies must impose. Many of them will refuse to take this; some will fall into the hands of poor companies, whether old line or assessment. This treatment would seem to be unfair to those who have rendered the greatest of all service. Third. As many who have taken insurance will refuse to go into private companies, the demand for service pensions in their behalf, should they subsequently meet with misfortune, would be well-nigh irresistible. Fourth. Inasmuch as the bureau must be maintained for the benefit of the many who come out either disabled or at least uninsurable, there will be but little if any additional cost in maintaining it for all of the men who have rendered military service. Those who will be insurable after the war will be a most desirable class to insure. Even the net premiums without loading will more than cover the cost, because their mortality will surely fall far below the expected rate. The Government will thus be enabled in some measure to recoup itself for its losses.

The strenuous objection to Article IV seems clearly to be based upon objection to any real governmental insurance as harmful to the private companies. This fear, in our judgment, is without justification; but even if it were fully justified, no private interest should be permitted to stand in the way of the Government doing justice to its fighting forces. To them alone this insurance is confined. The bill does not contemplate any extension beyond this limited class.

We have deferred a consideration of Article I, the administrative provisions, to the last. As heretofore stated, the bill strikes a new keynote as against the former pension legislation. For that reason alone, its administration should be separated from that of the present pensions. But the bill does not create a new bureau; it contemplates merely an extension of the War-Risk Bureau. Obviously, this bureau, which has so successfully dealt with Government insurance both of ships and of the seamen on merchant vessels since the beginning of the war, is the proper place for the administration of the insurance provisions. They, however, are but a part of and an addition to the compensation provisions. The bill is a unit; as such, its administration should be unified. The War-Risk Bureau, properly increased and extended, can adequately administer all of the sentence.

Again, this compensation for death would in many cases follow directly upon the family allowances to be given during the service. The bureau that administers the one should, therefore, administer the other. While allotments are to come out of the pay and are subject to regulation by the Secretary of War or of the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, the fact that the amount of the family allowance is to be determined by the bureau will have no tendency to create any confusion. Such a bureau will deal, not with a man but with his family. The Army and the Navy will thus be able to confine themselves to their own employee—the man.

The appropriations provided for in the bill have been based upon actuarial calculations. The factors taken into consideration are in the nature of things extremely uncertain; they can be at the best merely estimates, the correctness of which will depend upon the length of the war and the extent of our participation therein and the casualties that will occur. These can be but estimated and not determined at this time.

The drafted men are now leaving their homes. The families of many of them will be thrown upon the charity of the community; only prompt enactment of the bill will save them from this distressing calamity.

The Government that drafts its youth should not fail to deal with them justly and promptly. We urge the promptest consideration and passage of the bill.

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"U. S. S. MAYFLOWER,
"1 September, 1917.

"MY DEAR JUDGE: May I not express to you and through you to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House my sincere gratification at the favorable report the committee has just made on the bill granting family allowances, indemnities, and life insurance for the officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy; and the hope that the proposed measure may receive the prompt approval of the Congress?

"There are so many arguments for the bill that I do not know which to put forward as the most imperative. No doubt you have assembled them in your own mind in their most effective order. But what principally appeals to me about the bill is that it takes into consideration the whole obligation of the soldier not only, but the whole obligation of the Government—the obligations of justice and humanity, both to the soldier and to his family. It is one of the most admirable pieces of legislation that has been proposed in connection with the war, and I can not too earnestly urge its adoption.

"I observe with regret that the limit of life insurance available to the officers and men in the service has been reduced from $10,000 to $5,000. I earnestly hope that the $10,000 limit may be restored.

"Cordially and sincerely, yours,

"WOODROW WILSON.

ANALYSIS OF H. R. 5723.

Title: Amends act of September 2, 1914, as amended, establishing Bureau of War-Risk Insurance.

ARTICLE I. ADMINISTRATION.

Section 1: A director; salary, $6,000. Two divisions: Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance, as at present; Division of Military and Naval Insurance, new; each headed by a commissioner; salary, $5,000.

Section 2: Amends former act as follows:

Section 12: Sections 2 to 9 of former act shall refer only to the Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance.

Section 13: Director, subject to Secretary of Treasury, executes the act and makes all necessary rules, regulations, and decisions, except as otherwise provided.

Section 14: Such help as may be authorized by Congress. Use Army and Navy surgeons. Advisory board of three skilled insurance men, compensation not exceeding $20 a day.

Section 15: Power to issue subpoenas, take testimony, and invoke aid of court.

Section 16: Secretary to submit annual estimates.

Section 17: Appropriates $100,000 for expenses. All employees, except director, commissioners, and special experts, to be appointed from civil-service list.

Section 18: Appropriates $141,000,000 for family allowances under Article II.

Section 19: Appropriates $12,150,000 for compensation under Article III.

Section 20: Appropriates $23,000,000, together with all premiums received, for insurance losses, under Article IV.

Section 21: Creates a fund to pay interest on deposits.

Section 22: The committee's amendment strikes out the first provision, which makes living together in the open acknowledged relation of husband and wife for two years immediately preceding enlistment or draft conclusive evidence of marriage in the absence of proof that there is a legal spouse living.

The section further defines a number of terms as used in the act. (see sec. 22.)

Section 23: Payment may be made to suitable person if beneficiary is mentally incompetent or a minor.

Section 24: The bureau may act in an advisory capacity in respect to both the Government and other insurance carried by the men.

Section 25: Fine of $5,000 or not more than two years' imprisonment, or both, for certain perjury.

Section 26: Fine of $2,000 or not more than one year's imprisonment, or both, for certain frauds.

ARTICLE II. ALLOTMENTS AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES.

Section 200: Article confined to enlisted men.

Section 201: Allotment for wife, child, or former wife divorced and not remarried compulsory, except that on written consent and evidence of ability to support herself wife or former wife may waive it, and on man's application, or otherwise for good cause, exemption may be granted on conditions provided in regulations.

Compulsory allotment is to equal the Government allowance, but with $15 monthly minimum and half pay maximum; but for wife living separate or former wife divorced, maximum is the agreed or decreed amount, and former wife divorced is subordinated to wife and child.

Section 202: Voluntary allotment permitted subject only to regulation by Secretary of War or of the Navy, respectively.

Section 203: Secretary of War and of the Navy, respectively, authorized to compel so much of one-half of the man's pay as is not either compulsorily or voluntarily allotted to be deposited with the Government at 4 per cent interest, compounded semiannually. In case of death before repayment, it is payable to any designated beneficiary or next of kin.

Section 204: Maximum governmental family allowance, $50. Allowances granted only on written application by man or by or on behalf of beneficiary. Begins with enactment of amendment or subsequent enlistment and ends with discharge from service, but not more than one month after termination of present war emergency. Allowances for families in cases of desertion, imprisonment, and missing men subject to regulations.

Amount per month, class A, to a man's wife, former wife divorced, or child:

- (a) Wife alone, $15.
- (b) Wife and one child, $25.
- (c) Wife and two children, $32.50.

For each additional child, $5 additional.

- (d) One child, $5.
- (e) Two children, $12.50.
- (f) Three children, $20.
- (g) Four children, $30.

For each additional child, $5 additional.

Class B: Grandchild, parent, brother, or sister of man or woman:

- (a) One parent, $10.
- (b) Two parents, $20.
- (c) Each grandchild, brother, sister or additional parent, as defined in section 22, $5.

In the case of a woman:

- (d) One child, $5.
- (e) Two children, $12.50.
- (f) Three children, $20.
- (g) Four children, $30.

For each additional child, $5.

SEC. 205: Family allowances to class A only while the compulsory allotment is made, and in the case of a separated wife or former wife divorced only the difference, if any, between the allotment and the amount provided in agreement or decree.

SEC. 206: Allowances to class B only while dependent on the man, and then only if and while he makes an equal monthly allotment, except:

- (a) Maximum monthly allotment of half pay.
- (b) If no allotment to class A, then minimum monthly allotment, $15.
- (c) If compulsory allotment to class A, then monthly minimum allotment to be one-seventh of pay, with $5 minimum.
- (d) Exemption from allotment as a condition to allowance may be granted for good cause.

SEC. 207: Allowance to class B, subject to each of following limitations:

- (a) Can not exceed difference, if any, between allowance to class A and $50.
- (b) Can not exceed difference, if any, between allotment and amount habitually contributed for past year by the man to their support.

SEC. 208: As between wife, former wife divorced, and children not in her custody, and as between children, amount of allotment apportioned by regulations.

SEC. 209: Payment of allotment and allowances to or for beneficiaries, as may be provided by Secretary of War and of the Navy, respectively.

SEC. 210: Commissioner awards allowances, certifying award to War or Navy Department. Commissioner may reinvestigate and modify award. Amount determined by conditions existing monthly.

ARTICLE III. COMPENSATION FOR DEATH OR DISABILITY.

Section 300: Applies to commissioned officers, enlisted men, and nurse corps when employed in active service. Limited to death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or contracted in the course of the service and, as amended by committee, in line of duty.

Section 301: The bill provides for payment to any widow or child if death results from the injury; by the committee's amendment it is limited to a widow or children from a marriage contracted before injury. Compensation is monthly, based on percentage of the man's pay, as follows:

- (a) Widow, 25 per cent, but not less than $30.
- (b) Widow and one child, 35 per cent, but not less than $40.
- (c) Widow and two children, 40 per cent, but not less than $50.
- Five per cent additional, but not less than $5, for each additional child up to two.
- (d) One child, 20 per cent, but not less than $15.
- (e) Two children, 30 per cent, but not less than $25.
- (f) Three children, 40 per cent, but not less than $35.
- Five per cent additional, but not less than $10 for each additional child up to two.

(g) Widowed mother, 20 per cent, but not less than $25: Provided, however, That she shall not receive more than the difference, if any, between the amount payable to widow and children and 50 per cent of pay, or $60, and limited to death of one child: And provided further, She receives no compensation for death of husband.

Maximum monthly compensation, $200. Burial expenses not exceeding $100. As amended by committee, compensation ceases at death or remarriage instead of two years after remarriage. Compensation to child continues until 18 years, or marriage, or, if incapable, from mental or physical infirmity, of pursuing gainful occupation, then until marriage, death, or cessation of incapacity. If compensation to one ceases, then for the other beneficiaries the amount shall be as if they had been sole original beneficiaries. Apportionment as between widow and children not in her custody and as between children according to regulations.

Section 302: Compensation for disability. (1) Total disability. Monthly: percentage of pay:

- (a) Man alone, 40 per cent, but not less than $40.
- (b) If he has wife, 50 per cent, but not less than $55.
- (c) Wife and one child, 55 per cent, but not less than $65.
- (d) Wife and two or more children, 60 per cent, but not less than $75.
- (e) No wife, but one child, 50 per cent, but not less than $50.

Five per cent additional, but not less than $10 for each additional child up to two.

(f) Widowed mother substantially dependent on him, 10 per cent, but not less than $10 in addition.

If so helpless as to be in constant need of nurse or attendant, reasonable additional sum, not exceeding $20 per month. Maximum monthly, $200.

(2) Partial disability, percentage of compensation for total disability equal to degree of reduction in earning capacity if 10 per cent or more.

Schedule of ratings for permanent injuries to be adopted which may equal total disabilities shall be based on average impairments resulting from similar injuries in civil occupations and not upon impairment in each individual case. No reduction for individual success in overcoming handicap. Schedule readjustable in accordance with actual experience.

(3) Reasonable medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies and appliances to be granted.

(4) Each monthly payment according to then existing conditions in family.

Section 303: Required to submit to examinations. May have own physician present. Payment of reasonable traveling and other expenses and loss of wages incurred for examination. Suspension of compensation during refusal to submit. Consequences of unreasonable refusal to submit to treatment not deemed to result from the injury.

Section 304: Commutation of future compensation payments for disability permitted if injured person deemed competent and not likely to become public charge, and, on evidence satisfactory to director that it will be for his best interest and for the best interests of his dependents. Provided, however, in case of total disability, or partial disabilities rated at 30 per cent or more, only half of payment that he would receive if a single man shall be commutable.

Section 305: Must follow such course of rehabilitation, reeducation, and vocational training as United States may provide or procure to be provided. If course prevents following occupations, he may be re-enlisted and receive pay and family allowances during the period in lieu of compensation. Suspension of compensation during willful failure to follow course or to re-enlist therefor.

Section 306: Awards may be reviewed.

Section 307: Definition of pay.

Section 308: No compensation for death or disability which does not occur within one year after discharge, unless a certificate has been obtained within a reasonable time, fixed by regulations and not exceeding one year after discharge, that at time of discharge he was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability.

Section 309: Compensation for death not payable until death officially recorded. No compensation for period during which reported missing and family allowance made.

Section 310: No compensation for death inflicted unless by the enemy, as lawful punishment for crime or military offense. Dismissal of dishonorable, or had conduct discharge bars and terminates compensation.

Section 311: No compensation unless claim filed within one year after discharge or official recording of death. Time may be extended another year by director for good cause. If a minor or of unsound mind or physically unable to make claim the one or two-year period begins only at cessation of disability or appointment of guardian.

Section 312: No compensation payable for more than two years prior to date of claim. No back increase more than one year.

Section 313: Compensation not assignable, taxable, or subject to debts.

Section 314: Compensation not payable to those in receipt of service or retirement pay. Existing pension and gratuity laws not applicable to persons now in or hereafter entering the service, except so far as rights thereunder have accrued.

Compensation to nurses is in lieu of any claim under civil employees' compensation act.

Section 315: Assignment to United States of any right of action against other persons for causing injury or death, condition to compensation.

ARTICLE IV. INSURANCE.

Section 400: Applies to commissioned officers, enlisted men, and nurse corps. United States shall grant them insurance against death or total disability in multiples of $500, from $1,000 to a maximum fixed by the committee's amendment at $5,000 instead of $10,000, as in the bill.

Section 401: Must be applied for within 120 days after promulgation of terms or subsequent entry into service. Any person in active service on or after April 6, 1917, who is totally disabled or dies before expiration of the 120 days is deemed insured for life in monthly installments of $25, and if he dies before receiving 240 such installments, balance payable monthly to, but only if and while there survive him, widow, child, or widowed mother.

Section 402: Prompt publication full terms of contract of insurance. Insurance unassignable, free from claims of creditors of insured or beneficiary, payable only to spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and during total disability to injured person, and to such other persons as may be provided from time to time by regulations. Insurance payable only in installments. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, continuous installments, cash loan, paid up, and extended values, and other provisions for protection and alternative benefits as may be found reasonable, may be provided in the contract.

The committee has stricken out a further clause providing that "rights and privileges not provided for may be granted from time to time as may be prescribed by regulations."

Subject to regulations, insured may change beneficiary without his consent, but only within the permissible class.

Section 403: United States bears expenses of administration and excess mortality and disability cost due to war. Premium rates net; rates based upon American Experience Table of Mortality, 3½ per cent interest.

Section 404: During the war, insurance shall be term insurance for successive terms of one year each. After war it is convertible without medical examination into such forms and with such provisions for premium payments as may be prescribed by regulations, but payment of premiums in advance shall not be required for period of more than one month each. Premiums may be deducted from pay or deposits of insured or otherwise, at his election.

Section 405: In case of disagreement, action on insurance claim may be brought in district court of residence of any beneficiary. Reasonable attorney's fees, not exceeding 10 per cent of recovery, may be allowed by court. Unlawful for attorney or claim agent to receive any other compensation.

[H. Rept. No. 130, pt. 2, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following minority views:

This bill provides—

(1) For the establishment of a new bureau in the Treasury Department.

(2) Voluntary allotment of soldiers' and sailors' pay, and during the war compulsory allotment up to half of such pay, to be held by the United States at 4 per cent interest in the case of a man without dependents, or given to his dependents; to this, during the war, a family allowance made by the Government is added.

(3) Compensation for death or disability replacing all pension laws for present or future armies during peace or war.

(4) The right to every soldier and sailor to insure himself with the United States against death or total disability for $1,000 to $5,000. This applies to peace and war, but during the war the United States takes all war risks. The insured only pays peace rates.

It is perhaps not yet necessary that men with families should be forced into the battle lines. But in so far as they are not exempted some provision like Article II for compulsory allotment of pay and a family allowance is necessary to take care of those families and should be had by simple amendment of the law now authorizing the voluntary allotment of pay in the Army and Navy, under regulations of those departments.

Compensation for death and disability is purely pension. The increases provided in this bill should be carefully considered, preferably first by the Pension Bureau and the Pension Committees. A new bureau as to these matters may only embarrass their administration, while it will be an expense, and the proposition that any man may ask the United States to insure him up to $5,000 and to assume all the hazards of war may either go to the special benefit of a few, or cause claims against the United States that will be in the billions.

This bill came before the committee in recess as a war measure. In order to avoid delay, hearings were had before a very small number of the committee, and consideration was had by a bare quorum.

The committee has made no question as to its jurisdiction, although some of them believed that the question of pensions or compensation for service in past wars belongs to the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that questions of compensation to present or future soldiers or sailors, whether by pay, pension, or insurance, belong to the Committees on Military or Naval Affairs.

We are none of us experts as to Army and Navy pensions or insurance; none of us pretends thoroughly to understand this bill or its effects; nearly all reserved full liberty as to action upon the floor.

It is due to the House that the bill should be more carefully and fully explained than has been done in the report of the majority. It involves many complicated subjects and is not easy to understand.

ARTICLE I.

THE PROPOSED NEW BUREAU OF MILITARY AND NAVAL INSURANCE.

The act to which this bill is a supplement, provided for the war insurance of vessels, cargoes, and crews engaged in foreign commerce. That act had to do with commerce, and it was rightly referred to and reported by this committee. This established a bureau under a commissioner at $6,000 per annum.

By section 1 of this bill, page 2, the commissioner will be made a director and the bureau divided into two divisions, one of "marine and seamen's insurance," under the original act, and the other of "military and naval insurance," under the new provisions of this bill. Each division will be in charge of a commissioner at $5,000 per annum. The director, under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make regulations, decide all disputed questions, make rules and regulations as to the compensation of attorneys, as to proofs and evidence, as to allowances, allotments, compensation or insurance, the method of investigations and examinations and the form of adjudications and awards; (sec. 14) the bureaus may have deputies, assistants, actuaries, clerks, and employees, use Army and Navy surgeons, have an advisory board on insurance in fixing premium rates and adjusting claims; (sec. 15) witnesses and papers may be subpoenaed and proved on oath, with power to enforce the subpoenas; (sec. 16) and annual estimates are to be submitted.

By the bill (sec. 17) $100,000 is appropriated for present expenses; (sec. 18) $141,000,000 is appropriated for family allowances, to be paid upon awards of the commissioner; (sec. 19) $12,150,000 is appropriated for compensation, funeral expenses, etc.; and (sec. 20) $23,000,000 is appropriated for insurance.

SEC. 21. Sums withheld from pay are to be put in the Treasury in a separate fund. Then follow definitions of various relationships, family and military, with penalties for perjury or receiving payments fraudulently.

The first question as to Article I is whether any such bureau is necessary or advisable. While the men are in the Army or Navy their pay and its allotment, including family allowances, should be in the control of the War or Navy Departments. By this law, as drafted, the man and his family would take the pay from the military or naval authorities while they would go for the family allowance to this bureau of the Treasury.

Even the first year's appropriations are worth consideration:

For family allowances	$141,000,000
For death, disability, etc.	12,150,000
For insurance	23,000,000

Total	176,150,000
-------	-------------

In the hearings, on pages 53 to 55, are found the estimates on which these appropriations are based, which seem to be as follows:

	First year.	Second year.
Family allowance.....	$141,000,000	$190,000,000
Compensation for death.....	3,700,000	22,000,000
Compensation for total disability.....	5,250,000	35,000,000
Compensation for partial disability.....	3,200,000	21,000,000
Insurance, death, and disability.....	46,000,000	225,000,000
Total.....	199,150,000	493,000,000

At the bottom of page 52 is the statement:

"If the war lasts beyond September 1, 1919, the amounts payable will increase enormously as compared with those of the second year."

These estimates (p. 51) assume an army of a million men in the first year, family allowances to 40 per cent, averaging $300 per man; that only 250,000 will be in active service; that those men will have deaths of 75 per 1,000 a year, while the reserve will lose 4 per 1,000; and they estimate that in the second year there will be a million men at the front, and assume that only a quarter of the men will take out insurance at an average of $2,500 each.

If we get 2,000,000 men at the front, with disabilities continuing from previous years, the amount will be much greater. Payments for disability increased for 27 years after the Civil War and only increased largely after 15 years.

The figures should be considered under the various divisions of the bill, but to take insurance as an example (see pp. 51 and 52 of the hearings):

"To the 350,000 men referred to above as exposed to the war hazard, a death rate of 75 per thousand was applied. In arriving at this rate the experience of several life insurance companies was considered, and also such information as was available regarding the casualties in the various armies of Europe."

"These estimates are based on the assumption that 50 out of each 1,000 men exposed to the hazard of war will be totally disabled under the provisions of the bill, the assumption being predicated on such information as was obtainable from the British, Canadian, and German war records, although these are fragmentary."

The possibilities are somewhat as follows:

2,000,000 men in the battle line, deaths at 75 per 1,000.....	150,000
Disabilities, 50 per 1,000 (total).....	100,000
1,000,000 men in reserve, deaths 4 per 1,000.....	4,000

Total deaths and total disabilities..... 254,000

If these men are insured at $5,000 apiece, it will be $1,270,000,000. The 3,000,000 men would pay in $40 apiece, or $120,000,000.

No payments are too great to take care of our soldiers, if they be necessary and wise. These annual figures show the possibilities covered by this bill and the care with which it should be considered in every item.

These possibilities are staggering.

It must be assumed that intelligent Americans would all insure. If not, the single men would be most likely to do so, paying premiums out of their reserved pay.

No such scheme has ever been suggested for any army.

ARTICLE II.

ALLOTMENT AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE.

[Secs. 200-210, pp. 11-16.]

(Sec. 200) The article applies to all enlisted men.

(Sec. 202) Allotment of pay is compulsory as to wife and child, voluntary as to others. The wife may waive it. The compulsory allotment is equal to the family allowance made by the Government except that it shall not be more than half pay or less than $15, nor more than the alimony of a divorced wife.

(Sec. 202) The enlisted man may allot any or all of his pay, subject to regulation, to anyone.

(Sec. 203) What is not allotted up to half his pay may be put on a deposit to his credit at 4 per cent per annum.

(Sec. 204) A family allowance by the Government will be made monthly of not over $50 and terminates by death, discharge, or the end of the war. Note that the allotment or deposit of pay is applicable to peace as well as war. In the case of a private at $30 a month the payments in war would be as follows:

	Allotment.	Family allowance.	Total.
CLASS A.
Wife.....	$15.00	$15.00	$30.00
Wife, 1 child.....	15.00	25.00	40.00
Wife, 2 children.....	15.00	32.50	47.50
1 child, no wife.....	15.00	5.00	20.00
2 children, no wife.....	15.00	12.50	27.50
3 children, no wife.....	15.00	20.00	35.00
4 children, no wife.....	15.00	30.00	45.00
CLASS B.
[See p. 14.]
1 parent.....	15.00	10.00	25.00
2 parents.....	15.00	20.00	35.00

In all these cases only $15 remains to the man, while $30 to $47.50 is paid to his family. If the soldier or sailor receives enough pay, as in the case of a noncommissioned officer or officer, the allotment would be equal to the family allowance, and would double it.

As to parents, grandchildren, brothers, or sisters, allotment and allowance can be compulsory (p. 15, line 8, etc.) only if they are dependent. (Sec. 207, p. 15, line 19.) The family allowances A and B together shall not exceed $50, and the total received by any parent, etc., shall not be more than the son has paid them in the previous year.

(Sec. 209, p. 16, line 12) The allotments are paid to and for the beneficiaries as provided by regulations made by the Secretaries of War and Navy, respectively, but (sec. 210) the commissioner, on receipt of any application for family allowance, makes the award, which he certifies to the War or Navy Department, and he may reinvestigate and modify his award.

There will be confusion about this. If the man is away at the front, he can not very well be represented before the commissioner to oppose a compulsory allotment. The Navy and Army already are used to dealing directly with the families of their men and will know all the conditions when the man joins, how he behaves, and when he goes out to service, while the commissioner of the Treasury will have to receive word from them. It will make endless complications.

This system of control by two departments will be at least difficult in operation. After all, it is only a matter of pay for the Army and Navy and ought to be administered by them according to the circumstances, and not by an outside bureau.

The power to enforce a compulsory allotment of pay to the family ought to be in some statute. Such an allotment has been encouraged in the Army and Navy for years. It is permitted in the Navy under the act of June 10, 1896, and in the Army, by Military Laws (secs. 871-875, p. 339) under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War.

It is now thought highly desirable to give power to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to withhold up to half the pay of the enlisted man by payment to his family or by deposit to his credit at interest, and that in this time of war the Government should add a reasonable family allowance to be provided by regulations and to go to the family. The men do not need all their pay on active service in the war, and it is believed that the possession of more than half their pay will diminish their efficiency, and that it is for their benefit that this compulsion should be exerted.

A short act in the form above stated would deal with the whole matter practically without interference with the control which the War and Navy authorities ought to have over the pay of the men, whether it goes to the man or his family; and if Article II of this bill, for the compulsory allotment of pay and family allowances, is for the welfare of our Army and Navy, it can be secured by a simple provision in supplement to the above-cited acts, or Article II can be passed as a separate act properly amended to get rid of this new bureau.

ARTICLE III.

COMPENSATION FOR DEATH OR DISABILITY.

This article will take the place of the existing pension laws. Section 314, page 26, provides that compensation shall not be paid while the person is in receipt of service or retirement pay, and that existing pension laws and laws providing for gratuities or payment in the event of death in the service shall not be applicable to the present or future Army or Navy, except as rights have already accrued.

It is suggested that compensation is not the same as pension. It is simply another name so far as pensions for death and disabilities are concerned. See the acts, sections 4692 to 4695 of the Revised Statutes, providing for pensions for disabilities.

By section 4695 pensions for total disability ran from $8 to $30 a month, according to rank, but by various statutes the rate for everybody have been raised above those provided for an officer in this section, running as high as $50 for loss of both eyes, hands, or feet (June 18, 1874); $72 by the act of June 18, 1880; $100 for total blindness (Apr. 8, 1904). If the man died of his injury, the widow received the pension for total disability provided by the original act, but the $8 has been changed to $12.

This bill will change the whole theory of the pension acts of compensation for death or disability.

The compensation will be based upon the man's pay: For a widow alone, 25 per cent, but not less than $30; widow and one child, 35 per cent, but not less than $40; widow and two children, 40 per cent, but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $5, for each additional child up to two, etc. (p. 17, line 17, etc.). But (p. 18, line 16) the maximum monthly compensation for death shall be $200.

The great majority of widows at present get $12 a month each. This act gives always as much or more than the private's pay.

As a major general receives $8,000 a year, a brigadier general $6,000, a colonel $4,000, which with longevity pay may be $5,600; a lieutenant colonel $3,500, which with longevity pay may be $4,900; a major $3,000, which with longevity pay may be $4,200; a captain $2,400, which with longevity pay may be $3,360; a first lieutenant $2,000, which with longevity pay may be $2,800; a second lieutenant $1,700, which with longevity pay may be $2,380, this 25 per cent to 50 per cent may be quite a sum. In the case of field and general officers it may be not less than the $200 a month.

It is unquestionable that our pension laws have been very unfair to the officers' families. They started as fair laws in times of low prices, but increases have not been made as they should be, and the highest rate obtained by an officer's widow under the general law is $30 a month, which in the case of a high officer in the Navy or in the Army may be utterly insufficient to take care of his family. By this bill a private's widow will receive for her life the same amount that he received in the service—$30 a month (p. 17, lines 17-18).

A letter from the chairman of the Committee on Pensions (hearings, pp. 181-186) complains of the injustice of paying Civil War widows $12 a month, and $30 a month to all future widows. He likewise submits (p. 182) that the limitation of time to apply for partial disability compensation is wrong; that the Pension Bureau is thoroughly trained in all this matter and should keep control. It is due to Mr. KEY to refer to his letter.

It is a matter of real concern that the families of our officers and men should sometimes be in poverty. It ought not to be expected that the widow should be supported for life merely by reason of the husband's service, unless she was his wife at the time of the service. It is a question also how high the amount of pension can be placed and what dangers there will be that friends will insist that the enlisted man died of his injury some 40 years afterwards. The House must consider whether any changes in this compensation or pension law, for it is the same, should be made by amendment to the present laws and administered in the Pension Bureau, or should be made by a new law like this and administered elsewhere.

It may be strongly urged that if the new law is necessary, the administration should be left to the present Pension Bureau.

By section 302 the amount of compensation or pension where disability results from the injury, and not death, may vary from 40 per cent to 70 per cent of the injured man's pay with like minimums, but not exceed $200 a month, and partial disabilities should be at ratings subordinate thereto, besides (p. 21, line 8) medical, surgical, hospital services and supplies, and (line 14) subject to family conditions then existing. Examinations must be submitted to. (Sec. 304) Payments may be commuted into a lump sum but not over 50 per cent in certain cases. (Sec. 305) Vocational training is provided for. (Sec. 306) Review of the award. (Sec. 307) The pay is that of the time of the injury. (Sec. 308) The injury must be certified to within a year after discharge. (Sec. 309) Death must be proved by the records. (Sec. 310) Death by court-martial or dishonorable discharge bars all right to compensation. (Sec. 311) Claim must be made within a year and the time may be extended for a year. (Sec. 312) Compensation is limited to two years before the claim. (Sec. 313) Compensation is not assignable and free from creditors. (Sec. 314) The pension laws do not apply. (Sec. 315) The United States shall have the benefit of any action belonging to the injured party.

All these details are mentioned only because such matters are all old and well recognized in the Pension Bureau, where experienced men are employed who can deal with them.

Codification is dangerous. The Commissioner of Pensions has not been consulted as to this bill. This article needs careful consideration by those who know.

The estimates for the second year of the war show $77,000,000 for compensation alone and every year will increase it.

ARTICLE IV.

INSURANCE.

The bill provides that the United States shall sell insurance to any soldier or sailor against death or total disability for not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000. (Sec. 401.) This must be applied for within 120 days after enlistment or after notice of the terms of insurance under this bill, and every man previously enlisted who is totally disabled or who dies before this time will get $25 a month in 240 installments, or $6,000 altogether, to be paid to him or to his wife, child, or widowed mother. By section 402 the director is to publish a form of insurance not assignable or subject to creditors, and payable to the wife, issue, parent, brother, or sister, or to the person injured, and only by installments, with insurance provisions for maturity at certain ages, life or term policies, cash, loan, paid up, and extended values, with the right to change the beneficiaries.

These sections are applicable to peace as well as war. The United States bears the expense of administration.

(Sec. 403.) The premium rates must be the net rates based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality, with interest at 3½ per cent per annum. (Sec. 404.) Payments must be monthly and may be deducted from the pay or deposit of the insurer, or otherwise made at his election; and (sec. 405) the United States may be sued and attorneys' fees allowed as part of the judgment up to 10 per cent.

So far this is simply Government insurance up to $5,000 of any soldier or sailor who applies, with all the complications of the insurance business, and at a flat rate without any loading.

All these provisions are applicable to peace as well as war, but by sections 403 and 404 the United States bears the expense of the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war, and during the period of war the insurance shall be term insurance for successive terms of one year each, convertible after the war, without medical examination, into such form or forms of insurance and such provisions for premium payments as may be prescribed by regulations. (See bill, p. 30, lines 3-4, 9-14.)

Term insurance for one year means that when payment is made the party is insured against death for one year; no more and no less. In peace times a young man can obtain $1,000 of this insurance for about $10, a flat rate without expense being about $8. This means that only eight men out of a thousand usually die during the year, so that 1,000 policies paying $8 each would pay the losses by the death of eight men at $1,000 each. If more die, of course more has to be collected in order to pay the losses. If 75 die, each of the 1,000 men would have to pay $75 in order to pay the losses of $75,000. If the insurance likewise covers death and total disability and there are 50 disabled, each man would have to pay $125 in order to cover the policies of $1,000 each. If each of them held a policy of $5,000, the Government has to raise annually $625 on each policy to pay losses. It is proposed that the Government should receive only $40 a year on a $5,000 policy when it has to pay out $625 in each year on an average on these policies. Of course, some men will be at home in the reserve and the total amount received for the war risk will be somewhere near $60; but the Government is paying nine-tenths of the insurance and the sums to be paid will be quite large.

It is assumed that only a few will take out insurance; if so, these few will get advantage over their fellows, who will certainly insist that the discrimination shall be remedied and that they shall be assumed to have taken out policies, as this bill itself does as to men who die before the insurance plan is promulgated (p. 28, line 19). It is not the business of the Government to go into speculation of this sort, and there is no precedent for it.

In Canada there is no draft law and volunteers were wanted. The cities wished volunteers and issued policies free in the nature of a bounty. The city of Toronto established an insurance bureau and has issued or secured policies for $42,297,000. Up to the date of investigation by Mr. Wolfe (Care of Dependents of Enlisted Men in Canada, Misc. Series No. 10, Bureau of Publications No. 25, p. 8) American insurance companies had paid out $808,000 on the $10,000,000 of insurance which they had underwritten, and the city of Toronto had paid $930,000 under its more recent insurance. The granting of this insurance was practically a bounty for enlistment. They have no draft law yet in Canada. If the Government of the United States should grant every man such a policy, payable in installments, without cost to him, it would be substantially an increase of the compensation branch of the bill. This insurance plan has been submitted to experts who were opposed to the whole principle. (Hearings, pp. 23-20.) They suggest (pp. 24-25) that the Government should pay $1,000 in case of death during service or within five years from discharge to the man's beneficiary or his estate, so that the benefits should be uniform and not dependent upon individual selection or ability to purchase, so as not to give a disproportionate advantage to those who buy insurance, thus avoiding administrative expenses and the danger of speculation, of the pressure upon the enlisted man by self-appointed agents for the promotion of this specific business, and other conditions to be deprecated. The particular insurance plan proposed was formulated and advocated by Judge Mack. Mr. Ekern, of the Wisconsin Insurance Department, explains on pages 147 and 148 that the Government would have to continue in the insurance business. It is assumed, therefore, that the insured will continue his insurance out of his pay or pension compensation. (See p. 150.) Mr. Ekern does not like the system of term insurance (p. 151) and thinks it ought to be put on a life or 20-payment plan (p. 152, near bottom) at a higher premium.

The above views have restated the material part of the bill and the hearings with some care, so that they may be understood, and perhaps at too much length. In brief, it might be suggested:

(1) The establishment of a new bureau is unnecessary and unwise.

(2) The War and Navy Departments should respectively be authorized by statute to allot up to half of the pay of enlisted men to their dependents, or to a savings fund under proper regulations, and also to make family allowances under like regulations, not exceeding a reasonable sum. No new bureau should interfere.

(3) The pension or "compensation" based upon a per cent of the pay may be a fair principle. Some limitation should be placed upon claims that death or disability has resulted many years after the injury, and a maximum limit of the compensation might be provided in each case.

(4) There should be no insurance except what is provided by the Government, in which case, if it be payable in installments, it will come under the title of "compensation." The United States is not yet ready to enter into the business of state insurance, which must infallibly follow if this scheme be adopted. The insurance scheme is unwise, unnecessary, and uncertain.

I have thought it only right to try to explain this bill more fully to the House. Whatever we can justly and possibly do for our gallant soldiers and sailors and their families we will do. But we ought to understand what we do and give it careful consideration.

RICHARD WAYNE PARKER.

EXTENSION AND REVISION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, at the request of the North Carolina State Council of National Defense, a speech delivered by ex-Senator Pritchard upon the question of patriotism and the duty of the American citizen in this hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the address to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL CHAPLAINS AT LARGE.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 5271.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman from New York for that purpose.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 5271.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is it?

Mr. SIEGEL. It is a bill providing for the appointment of 20 chaplains at large.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests the gentleman take the matter up when the Speaker is present, the present occupant of the chair having no information concerning it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. THOMAS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. SULZER, on account of serious illness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. Cox, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House (Sixty-fourth Congress, second session) without leaving copies, the papers in the following cases, no adverse report having been made thereon:

H. R. 18388. A bill granting a pension to Benjamin Griffith;

H. R. 18390. A bill granting a pension to William Andry; and

H. R. 19744. A bill granting a pension to George Devol.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say before making a motion to adjourn, that to-morrow the Army and Navy compensation and insurance bill (H. R. 5723) will be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair wishes to state that upon the completion of that bill the House will be requested to consider the emergency deficiency bill.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, September 7, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the Navy Department for the purpose of acquiring and providing facilities for the expeditious construction of additional torpedo-boat destroyers for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 358), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2785) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 135), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5918) to authorize the President to organize provisionally as Field Artillery or Infantry, and to use as Field Artillery or Infantry during the existing emergency, such regiments of Cavalry as he may designate, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 136), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LARSEN: A bill (H. R. 5947) to prevent discrimination by the Secretary of War or other military authority of the United States against the organization, establishment, and existence of church, fraternal, or secret-order organizations, at and on the grounds of forts, garrisons, and military camps of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 5948) to provide for the erection of an armory in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 5949) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. GOULD: Memorial of the General Assembly of the State of New York, requesting the Federal Government to make rules governing the manufacture and distribution of iron, steel, and other materials, so as to give preference to the manufacture of farming implements; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the General Assembly of the State of New York, favoring the mobilization of immigrant aliens and the transportation of them to States and Territories where farm service may be needed; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

EMBARGO ON COTTON.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, yesterday I called attention to certain influences that I believed were advocating the embargo on cotton to serve their selfish ends and not patriotic ends. I wish to read an article which appears in the Washington Post this morning under the head of "Views of travelers met in Capital hotel lobbies." Under the caption "Expect cotton to reach 20 cents" there appears what I will read. I wish to say for the information of the Senate that cotton is above 20 cents now, but this is the attitude of the manufacturers, not only from the New England States but from Southern States as well:

EXPECTS COTTON TO REACH 20 CENTS.

"Twenty-cent cotton will be the ruling market figure this winter, in my judgment," declared Gen. Julian S. Carr, of Durham, owner of the largest cotton mills in the South, at the Willard. "I do not believe that the price of cotton will go below that figure, nor, as a manufacturer of cotton goods, do I desire it. Those persons who are declaring that the cotton spinners want an embargo on cotton that they may profit by a decreased price of the raw material and sell their manufactured goods at a price based on high-priced cotton are imputing unpatriotic motives to the manufacturers. I favor an embargo on foodstuffs, and perhaps on cotton, and I so telegraphed the President; but it is because I believe that we have supplied the European nations long enough and that it is time we should be looking after our own needs. The outlook for a good cotton crop this year is excellent. I believe we shall make more than an average crop, and I reiterate that, in my judgment, the price will not go below 20 cents a pound, and I do not want it to go below that figure."

Gen. Carr has joined the staff of Mr. Hoover, and will remain in Washington for several months.

In other words, the cotton crop is short, and in order that it may not go too high because of the lack of supply he is willing to help invoke an embargo to restrict its exportations to neutral countries under legitimate conditions in order that American manufacturers may get it cheaper, that the manufacturers may get their raw material cheaper, when we are not manufacturing to-day more than half of the American production. They propose to cut off the foreign demand for our cotton because there is going to be another short crop this year. He frankly states it is because he wants American manufacturers served first, the American manufacturer at the expense of growers, and leave manufactured goods without any limit to the price that may be obtained. So the insinuation I made yesterday is verified to-day out of the mouth of a manufacturer himself. The question needs investigation by us, who represent the people, to know whether or not the embargo on cotton is justifiable under the circumstances, breaking the market $30 a bale and reducing our importation of European gold to the amount of four to five hundred million dollars, and impoverishing those who produce this necessary article.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In connection with the cotton situation I ask to have read a telegram which I have just received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

HOUSTON, TEX., September 5, 1917.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The cotton gamblers have recently made a raid of $40 per bale on cotton, and we are convinced that the speculators will not permit the cotton farmers to receive for their crop a price the cotton is worth. We appeal to Congress to immediately place cotton under the food-control act, so that both producer and consumer can be protected from price manipulation of cotton gamblers.

H. N. POPE, President,

I. N. MCCOLLISTER, Secretary,
Association State Farmers' Union Presidents.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ZONE SYSTEM.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD certain statements from certain magazines about the zone system and replies. I do not care to have them read. I merely wish to have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, August 30.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,

Washington, D. C.:

Give us anything but the zone system; tax us unmercifully; confiscate our property; endanger our existence, but don't choke us to death.

McCLURE'S MAGAZINE.

THE LADIES' WORLD.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1917.

McCLURE'S MAGAZINE,
New York City.

DEAR SIR: Your telegram of the 30th ultimo with reference to the zone system received and noted.

There are two reasons why you are selling McClure's Magazine at the same price everywhere:

(1) The amount of income that you receive from advertising is largely increased by the number of your circulation. You can afford to sell your magazine at the same price all over the country because of the increased amount that you receive from advertising, when your circulation is increased.

(2) You are enabled to do this because of the immense bounty or gratuity that the Government is annually paying you by way of rebates in hauling periodicals.

Publishers are the only class of people to which our Government pays these bounties or gratuities. When the system was inaugurated, it was for the purpose of distributing learning throughout the country, and, of course, amounted to a very small total sum annually; but the magazines have gone far afield from what their original purpose was, and now the larger part of these magazines are devoted to advertising—purely a commercial enterprise—and the Government is still extending these bounties at a present loss of $89,000,000 a year.

If the Government hauls your periodicals over the country at one-eighth of the cost of such haul, why shouldn't it haul the school books of the country on the same basis? Why shouldn't it haul the religious books on the same basis? Why shouldn't it haul school-teachers and professors on the same basis? Why shouldn't it haul meat on the same basis or bread on the same basis?

Grapefruit in Florida is very cheap. We have to pay a great deal more for it when it is hauled to Washington or New York or Chicago for consumption. Why? Because it requires money to pay the freight. On the theory of your letter, the Government ought to give to the grapefruit dealers a rebate on freight rates on grapefruit, so that the people of New York can eat grapefruit at the same price that the people of Florida get it.

Now, the amendment proposed by me takes away only one-seventh of the present bounty that you are receiving from the Government by reason of the hauling of your periodicals. Surely in this time of war the periodicals should not object to this very small division of the bounties they are receiving. Do you think it is quite patriotic for you to object? We are conscripting the bodies and perhaps the lives of our young men in this war. We are also conscripting the wealth of the country. Is it possible that we can be wrong in conscripting one-seventh of the bounties that we are paying a favored class of our citizens? Remember that we are not taxing you at all. We are taxing other individuals and corporations to a very great extent, but we are not taxing you specially. In this amendment all we are doing is conscripting one-seventh of your bounty.

At such a time as this those who have been receiving such tremendous bounties as the periodicals have been receiving for many years ought not to hesitate for one moment when called upon not to be taxed but only to give up one-seventh of the immense bounty that they are receiving.

Do you think it is quite patriotic to contend against giving up one-seventh that the Government is paying you when other men and other corporations are being taxed as they are in this revenue bill?

I quote your telegram:

"Give us anything but the zone system; tax us unmercifully; confiscate our property; endanger our existence, but don't choke us to death."

If you are familiar with the amendment I don't see how you could have sent this telegram. We are not taxing you at all but are simply taking you one minute in every seven from the very fat and juicy Government feast that you have been sucking for quite a while. This feast is in the nature of a bounty or gratuity as above set out, and we are just breaking your hold from it one-seventh of the time and allowing you to continue to suck the other six-sevenths of the time. You ought to be satisfied at this generous treatment.

Very truly, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 31, 1917.

Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

When you voted in favor of zone system you were probably unaware of the injustice it would mean to a hundred thousand boys and girls throughout the country who are studying current events and history in the Literary Digest; to 62 high schools in Tennessee we are sending thousands of copies weekly of the Literary Digest at half price, exactly the same price as pupils in New Jersey pay. Under the zone system the price will be 6½ cents in Tennessee and 5 cents in New Jersey; it does not seem to us a wise policy to adopt a system which compels a citizen of Tennessee or California to pay more for his reading matter than the citizen of New York. As citizens we realize the tremendous strain under which every Senator has been working in trying to equitably adjust the many sides of the war-revenue measure during the recent months and do not wish in any way to be understood as criticizing any man's judgment, but we respectfully urge you to carefully reconsider the zone system for we feel sure it has in it the seed which may easily develop a sectional spirit and at a time when unity of purpose and action are essential to our country's safety.

THE LITERARY DIGEST.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1917.

The LITERARY DIGEST,
New York City.

DEAR SIRS: Your telegram of the 1st, with reference to the zone system, received and noted.

Notwithstanding your telegram, I hope I am aware of the questions involved in this matter.

If a schoolboy in Tennessee buys his schoolbooks in New York and has them shipped to him, he has to pay more freight than the schoolboy in New Jersey would pay if he had the same number and weight of books sent to him in New Jersey, because the distance is greater.

The two reasons why you are selling the Literary Digest anywhere at half price are as follows:

(1) The amount of income that you receive from advertising is largely increased by the number of your circulation. You can afford to sell your papers at a smaller price because of the increased amount that you receive from advertising when your circulation is increased.

(2) You are enabled to do this because of the immense bounty or gratuity that the Government is annually paying you by way of rebates in hauling periodicals.

Publishers are the only class of people to which our Government pays these bounties or gratuities. When the system was inaugurated it was for the purpose of distributing learning throughout the country, and, of course, amounted to a very small total sum annually; but the magazines have gone far afield from what their original purpose was, and now the larger part of these magazines are devoted to advertising—purely a commercial enterprise—and the Government is still extending these bounties at a present loss of $89,000,000 a year.

Why shouldn't it haul meat on the same basis, or bread on the same basis? Grapefruit in Florida is very cheap. We are taxing other individuals and corporations to a very great extent, but we are not taxing you specially. In this amendment all we are doing is conscripting one-seventh of your bounty.

You speak of developing a sectional spirit. There is no danger of developing a sectional spirit in this war unless we undertake to distribute the burdens of taxation unequally. You are right in saying that unity of purpose and action are essential to our country's safety. At such a time those who have been receiving such tremendous bounties as the periodicals have been receiving for many years ought not to hesitate for one moment when called upon not to be taxed, but only to give up one-seventh of the immense bounty that they are receiving.

Do you think it is quite patriotic to contend against giving up one-seventh that the Government is paying you when other men and other corporations are being taxed to the extent that they are in this revenue bill?

I hope, after reading this letter, which is given in the best spirit in the world, that you will take your own advice and reconsider your petition not to give up this fractional part of the bounty that the Government is now paying you.

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

NEW YORK, August 31, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Army and Navy Club, Washington, D. C.:

If you feel increase in postage rates necessary, make a flat rate, which is fair to everybody. Why discriminate between magazines and newspapers? Figures show newspaper earnings are considerably greater than earnings of magazines, and why discriminate between different classes of magazines? We protest against McKellar amendment as being discriminatory, and with many will be confiscatory. Our postage bill for 1916 was $197,000. With McKellar amendment this would amount to $690,000. Our profit for 1916 was $233,000. With McKellar amendment our loss would have been $260,000. We have already been compelled to make adjustments to cover increased cost of paper under these conditions. It is quite evident the Government will not be able to collect the extra revenue called for in the budget and will unnecessarily force to the wall a great number of publications working hard to make ends meet. Levy a special war tax, but do not confiscate. Investigation will show magazines are willing to stand for taxation, but newspapers, who are being let off practically scot free, are against anything and everything.

COLLIER'S WEEKLY,
A. G. G. HAMMESFAHR,
Vice President and General Manager.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1917.

Mr. A. G. G. HAMMESFAHR.

Collier's Weekly, New York City, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: Your telegram of August 31 about increase in postage rates received and noted.

Inasmuch as my amendment takes away only one-seventh of the bounty that you are now receiving, by a simple calculation that bounty is $3,451,000 a year. You say your present postage is $197,000 and that your postage, if my amendment is adopted, is $690,000. Take one from the other and it leaves $493,000. As my amendment takes only one-seventh of the bounty away from you, by multiplying by seven the bounty that the Government now pays you in the way of rebates is, by this simple calculation, $3,451,000.

In this time of our great trouble, when our country is in the most momentous war of its history, it does not seem to me that you are in a position to complain when Congress takes away only one-seventh of the bounty that you are now receiving in the way of rebates on the carriage of your publications through the mail.

Remember, we are not taxing you a cent. We are only taking away a very small portion of your rebates. There is no discrimination against or in favor of any publication in the adopting of the zone system. Newspapers and magazines pay exactly the same rate in the same zones.

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

NEW YORK, August 31, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The McKellar zone postal measure, with zones arranged to penalize only national periodicals, will drive many out of existence. In the case of the Review of Reviews Magazine, the total actual net profits for eight months of the present fiscal year are $27,800, while increase in postage under the McKellar amendment is $35,400. This is an attempt to levy a tax of 130 per cent on the net profits of an institution over and above all the regular war taxes other corporations pay, which is impossible. A few of the largest periodicals, with the strongest advertising patronage, could stand the new tax, and the measure would tend to give them a monopoly. Some periodicals could pass the tax to the consumer. Some of the best will have to stop publication entirely, and others stop circulating in the distant zones. We ask you to reconsider this measure and to see that it is destructive and largely futile for revenue purposes.

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS CO.,
ALBERT SHAW, President.
CHARLES D. LANIER, Treasurer.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1917.

Mr. ALBERT SHAW, President,

The Review of Reviews, New York City, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: Your telegram of the 31st received and noted.

You say the increase in postage under the McKellar amendment is $35,000. If your figures are correct, then the amount of bounty that the Government is paying you is seven times that amount, or $245,000 per year. This is shown by the fact that the McKellar amendment takes only one-seventh of the bounty that the Government is now paying you in the way of rebates on your publications. It is not taxing you at all. All the taxes have been eliminated. It is just requiring you to give up one-seventh of your present bounty.

Surely at a time like this every patriotic citizen should be willing to give up something, and it seems to me it will be easier for those who are receiving great bounties at the hands of the Government to give up a small portion—one-seventh of such bounty—than it will for the ordinary citizen to be taxed.

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

NEW YORK, August 31, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our little business would be strangled by zone system of second-class postal rates. Your resolution would increase our mailing cost about $15,000 annually. This would wipe out all taxable income and make us face deficit of about $7,000. Most urgently beg you reconsider your resolution.

AUTOMOBILE TOPICS.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1917.

AUTOMOBILE TOPICS,

New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIRS: Your telegram of the 31st received and noted.

You say that my amendment will cost you in additional postage $15,000 per year. Inasmuch as my amendment takes away only one-seventh of the bounty that the Government now gives you, that means that your paper gets $105,000 a year as a bounty or gratuity now.

Do you not think in this time of our great stress, when we are in the greatest war the world has ever known, that it would be patriotic for you to give up just one-seventh of what the Government has annually given you without objecting to it? Most any of our citizens would be willing to give one-seventh of any gratuity that the Government might be willing to give them, and I believe without objection. Remember we are not taxing you. We are just taking away one-seventh of your present Government bounty.

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

NASHVILLE, TENN., August 30, 1917.
 Hon. K. D. McKellar,
 United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Zone bill, of which you are author, means the death of religious papers, which are already running by the closest margin. Will you not use your influence to exempt religious papers, Baptist and Reflector?
 ALBERT R. BOND, Editor.

AUGUST 31, 1917.

ALBERT R. BOND,
 Editor Baptist and Reflector, Nashville, Tenn.:

Under my amendment, of which you complain, all religious publications are exempted from the zone system and pay the same tax as before.

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 30, 1917.
 Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
 United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Proposed zone system will cost us $120,000 annually over present rate, an increase of 200 per cent, or ten times our entire profit. We protest against this unjust, unpatriotic discrimination. Leslie's and Judge are earnestly striving to support the Government.

JOHN A. SLEICHER, Editor.

AUGUST 31, 1917.

Mr. JOHN A. SLEICHER,
 Editor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your telegram of August 30, saying that the proposed zone system would cost you $120,000 annually over the present rate, received and noted.

Inasmuch as my amendment takes only one-seventh of the loss that the Government sustains by hauling your publications, then, according to your figures, the Government is now paying you a bounty of $840,000 annually.

In this time, when we need to carry on the war effectively, do you not think that giving up one-seventh of the bounty that the Government contributes to your publications each year will be only what you ought to do? I imagine most any citizen who received a gratuity from the Government would be willing to give up one-seventh of it when the country was at war.

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.
 NEW YORK, August 30, 1917.

KENNETH MCKELLAR,
 The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If the McKellar amendment to tax bill increasing the rate of second-class mail becomes a law our printing and binding plant, which produces 300,000 copies of magazines daily and employing 1,200 employees, will be forced to shut down. The zone system will disrupt and destroy the entire printing industry. Magazine publishers would establish small printing plants in different sections of the country, so that the Post Office Department would not receive any additional revenue. The Lord knows our load under present conditions is very strenuous, and hope you will not help put this bill through, which would bring about the above crisis.

Mr. CHARLES SCHWEINLER,
 421 Hudson Street, New York City, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: Your telegram of August 30 received and noted. Will you kindly advise me how much you pay in postage now; that is to say, in the year 1916, and then figure out what you would pay under my amendment?

The amendment only requires you to restore to the Government one-seventh of what the Government is paying you in the way of rebates on hauling your publications.

Do you not think that in this time of war you could well afford to pay over to the Government one-seventh of the bounty that is being paid you?

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION,
 Boston, Mass., August 31, 1917.

DEAR SIR: The Youth's Companion, in the 90 years of its existence, has never before objected to or protested any action of Congress. It has been the policy of the paper to cooperate in every way with the Government, but the zone-system amendment to the war-revenue bill, if it becomes a law, would be so disastrous to us and to all publications of national circulation using the mails exclusively that we can not do otherwise than appeal to you for protection.

We have no means of distribution other than the mails. Our circulation has been extended to all parts of the country, following methods approved and encouraged by the Government. We have every reason to believe that the paper, being nonsectarian and nonpolitical, reaching all classes, has exercised a wide national influence and done its part to lessen sectionalism and extol an all-American spirit for patriotism and fellowship, and that with other national publications of like character wholly dependent upon the mails it should not be crippled and imperiled by legislation that would impose a tax so impossible to be borne as the zone system provides.

The advance in cost of paper was a heavy and unusual tax upon our resources, an advance of over 50 per cent.

The amount of second-class postage paid by us in 1916 was $38,918.01. This amount under the zone system provided in the amendment would be increased to $136,213.04, and presents a situation that would work hardship and loss that we are sure it can not be the wish of Senators to impose.

Senator WEEKS's resolution in the present exigency would save and help while the zone system would destroy, and we hope may receive your approval. We are perfectly willing to do everything in our power and to have any profit in the business taxed to the limit, but the zone system entirely wipes out profit and creates loss.

We ask, because the situation is so critical, your most favorable attention to our appeal for saving action.

Yours, truly,

PERRY MASON CO.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION,
 Boston, Mass., August 31, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
 Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We realize something of the tax upon you and your great responsibilities at this critical time, and so shall the more appreciate your consideration of the inclosed statement, copy of which we have sent to your associates in the Senate.

Yours, truly,

PERRY MASON CO.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1917.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION,
 Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 31st, with reference to the zone system, received and noted.

There are two reasons why you are selling the Youth's Companion at the same price everywhere:

(1) The amount of income that you receive from advertising is largely increased by the number of your circulation. You can afford to sell your papers at the same price all over the country because of the increased amount that you receive from advertising when your circulation is increased.

(2) You are enabled to do this because of the immense bounty or gratuity that the Government is annually paying you by way of rebates in hauling periodicals.

Publishers are the only class of people to which our Government pays these bounties or gratuities. When the system was inaugurated it was for the purpose of distributing learning throughout the country, and, of course, amounted to a very small total sum annually; but the magazines have gone far afield from what their original purpose was, and now the larger part of these magazines are devoted to advertising—purely a commercial enterprise—and the Government is still extending these bounties at a present loss of $39,000,000 a year.

If the Government hauls your periodicals over the country at one-eighth of the cost of such haul, why shouldn't it haul the schoolbooks of the country on the same basis? Why shouldn't it haul the religious books on the same basis? Why shouldn't it haul school-teachers and professors on the same basis? Why shouldn't it haul meat on the same basis, or bread on the same basis? Grapefruit in Florida is very cheap. We have to pay a great deal more for it when it is hauled to Washington or New York or Chicago for consumption. Why? Because it requires money to pay the freight. On the theory of your telegram, the Government ought to give to the grapefruit dealers a rebate on freight rates on grapefruit, so that the people of Boston can eat grapefruit at the same price that the people of Florida get it.

Now, the amendment proposed by me takes away only one-seventh of the present bounty that you are receiving from the Government by reason of the hauling of your periodicals. Surely in this time of war the periodicals should not object to this very small division of the bounties they are receiving. Do you think it is quite patriotic for you to object? We are conscripting the bodies and perhaps the lives of our young men in this war. We are also conscripting the wealth of the country. Is it possible that we can be wrong in conscripting one-seventh of the bounties that we are paying a favored class of our citizens? Remember that we are not taxing you at all. We are taxing other individuals and corporations to a very great extent, but we are not taxing you specially. In this amendment all we are doing is conscripting one-seventh of your bounty.

At such a time as this those who have been receiving such tremendous bounties as the periodicals have been receiving for many years ought not to hesitate for one moment when called upon not to be taxed but only to give up one-seventh of the immense bounty that they are receiving.

Do you think it is quite patriotic to contend against giving up one-seventh that the Government is paying you when other men and other corporations are being taxed as they are in this revenue bill?

You state that the amount of postage paid by you in 1916 was $38,918.01 and that under the amendment you would have to pay $136,213.04. This is a difference in round numbers of $93,000. Inasmuch as the amendment offered by me takes only one-seventh of the bounty that is now being paid you, by a single calculation the whole amount of the bounty you are now receiving is $686,000. When we conscript only one-seventh of this large bounty it seems to me that we are treating you very fairly.

Sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

PETITION.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Fresno, Cal., praying that a labor census be taken and a system of industrial conscription be enforced for the period of the war, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

LANDS FOR GRAZING PURPOSES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2776) providing for the classification of lands under the stock-grazing homestead act in certain States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 115) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS (for Mr. WALSH):

A bill (S. 2845) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the leasing of certain coal lands in Wyoming; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2846) to amend section 11 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of September 7, 1916; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 2847) granting an increase of pension to Sylvanus Smith (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2848) granting a pension to Linda H. Lount (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2849) granting a pension to Annie V. Stockton; and

A bill (S. 2850) granting an increase of pension to Jonathan Dellinger; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2851) to restore to certain Civil War officers on the retired list rank of which deprived by inequalities in past system of promotions; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5901. An act to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, a condition has arisen in the life of the Nation calling for the patriotism of this country, calling for those who represent the sovereign people of America in Congress assembled to defend the Nation's honor and to attempt to right the wrong which we feel has been inflicted upon our country. In defending this Nation against this wrong we have, under the exigency of the occasion, felt it necessary and deemed it proper to call upon the young manhood of our country to take up arms and go to the battle front to defend our flag. This, of course, is very essential. It is necessary to have our Republic represented upon the firing line if we are to successfully win in this conflict, if we are to successfully establish and inaugurate throughout the great world the principles of democracy which have ever been held so dear to the American people.

Another great exigency arises, Mr. President, incident to this conflict and that is that of raising the sinews of war. It is necessary that we not only impose upon our young stalwart manhood the burden of fighting our battle, the sacrifice of life, the sacrifice of opportunity during these strenuous days, but we must also impose upon the American people a taxation burden. The problem confronting the Senate at the present time is to what source we will turn as we impose this burden, whether or not we shall impose it upon those who are most able to bear the burden or whether we shall place it upon the people of this country who can ill afford to take upon themselves additional responsibilities and additional hardships.

As we have during these weeks considered this problem of such momentous extent, I have been firmly impressed that we should turn to the wealth of this country, that we should turn to those who are most able to bear the burden and there raise the greater part of the revenue which is necessary. Therefore I have been among those who have advocated increasing the rate of taxation upon war profits. I have been one of those who have advocated, and I am now advocating, an increase in the rate of taxation upon the large incomes throughout the Nation.

Mr. President, if to defend a policy of this kind smacks of a lack of patriotism, if it smacks of disloyalty to our country, then I will have to stand and plead guilty to the indictment.

I do not question, Mr. President, the motive or the purpose of any Senator who may disagree with me upon this subject. I have been somewhat astonished, however, that some upon this floor have impugned to those who were seeking to have these rates increased improper motive and disloyalty to their country.

Mr. President, is it disloyal to advocate a policy which seeks to make those who are able bear the burden of the Nation instead of inflicting undue hardships upon the great rank and file of the country? Is it disloyal to say to those who are receiving an enormous income, those who have been making and are making fabulous profits known as war profits, that we shall impose upon them the greater burden instead of shifting it to the masses of the people of this Nation, who already have hardships and trials which hamper them to a great extent in winning their way even to comfortable circumstances in the race of life?

Mr. President, if this is disloyalty, then I am willing to plead guilty to the indictment.

Some here may question the good faith, as they have, of those who favor raising the rate of taxation on the large incomes and war profits, but they are in a hopeless minority. I have an abiding faith as to what the verdict of the people of my own State and America will be regarding those who favor these increases on large incomes and war profits, and I will gladly abide that verdict.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, when there has come a question throughout this country as to whether or not the wealth and capital of the Nation should bear a greater part or a large proportionate part of the burdens under the circumstances, one of the cloaks of refuge of those who have disagreed to imposing that burden has been to cast aspersion upon those who contended that they should bear burdens they were able to bear, and that they should give maintenance in support of the Government. I have been contending against such an imputation ever since I entered public life. We can go back and deal with the policies in our States, respectively. You seek reform legislation; you seek legislation that is to require the wealth of the country or the corporate interests of the country to do its full duty, and invariably you are met with such imputations and insinuations from those who believe that the whole prosperity of the country, that the very destiny of the Nation, depends only upon the prosperity of our wealthy citizenship—the big business of the country.

Mr. President, I have not during my public career entertained that view. I realize that the great wealth of the Nation, I realize that capital, I realize that those who are operating and carrying on great industries are potent factors in the prosperity of the country. I realize that they, too, deserve commendation for their enterprise and for their industry, and I would not rob nor take from them their meed of praise for whatever they are doing or for whatever they have done for the development and for the prosperity of this great Nation of ours. But, Mr. President, regardless of my appreciation of their efforts, regardless of the fact that I realize that they have been instrumental in building up here a prosperous nation and a wonderful country, I can not, on account of that realization, forget that the great producing classes of this country—the man who takes wealth from the unfriendly soil, the man who with his brain and his brawn, by his labor, brings into existence the wealth of the Nation—should also be taken into consideration when we are dealing with Government problems that do not merely affect the wealth of the Nation but affect the great wage-earning class, the great masses of moderate means, the small producer of the Nation. I say, Mr. President, that he, too, has been a factor in the development of our country. He, too, has had to do with developing this land of ours, once but a waste, once an unbroken forest, into the wealthy, the prosperous land that it is at the present time.

I believe that we should increase the rates imposed upon the large incomes. If we do not do that, it is unquestionably going to be necessary then to impose taxes upon articles of consumption. If we impose taxes upon commodities, then we must impose a direct tax upon the consumer. When we impose a direct tax upon the consumer, we then reach out and add to the burdens of the people of this country who are already heavily burdened on account of the increased cost of living brought about during the strenuous times of the past few years.

I want to speak more particularly, Mr. President, in regard to an amendment which I offered to raise the exemption from the income tax from $1,000 for single persons to $2,000, and from $2,000 for married persons to $3,000. The bill, as recommended by the committee, exempts from the income tax only $1,000 to a single person. It exempts only $2,000 to a married person.

I submit, Mr. President, that if we are so solicitous that those who are enjoying enormous fortunes, running into the millions of dollars, should be so tenderly considered that they should be allowed to retain a sufficient part of their income that they may enlarge and extend their business operations, that they may extend their plants, then, surely, Mr. President, the poor people of this country who are making but a scant living, the poor people of this country who under the salaries that they are receiving are not given an opportunity to provide more than the ordinary necessities of life for their families, should have a little latitude in which they may provide a little comfort for the family and give a little more educational opportunity to their children. If it is necessary to the prosperity of this country that you should allow those receiving large incomes to retain a sufficient part of their incomes to extend and to enlarge their businesses, and we may say, Mr. President, to increase and to continue to build up their fortunes, then surely it is necessary for the prosperity and the happiness of the American people that we give the man of small income some margin before we tell him that he has to contribute to the Government in the nature of a war tax.

Take a married man with several children living on an income of $2,220 a year. He is subject to the tax as soon as his income reaches $2,000 a year. I say, Mr. President, that that income is not sufficient for him to enjoy, for his family to enjoy, what to-day, under the present increased cost of living, is necessary for ordinary comfort and to give reasonable opportunities to his children. I think that the exemption should be raised, and that he should be allowed as much as $3,000 a year.

Are we going to say to the people at the bottom of the ladder, "We think that those who are receiving fabulous incomes in this country should be allowed latitude in which they can keep on building and continue to pyramid their fortunes, but so far as you are concerned we propose to begin to tax you before you have more than sufficient earnings to enjoy merely the necessities of life"? Two thousand dollars a year is no more than $1,200 a year was 10 years ago, considering the increased cost of living to-day. While the increased cost of living may be disagreeable to the man with an income of $10,000, or $20,000, or $50,000, or $100,000 per year, it does not impose any burden upon him; it does not impose any deprivation upon him; but as to the poorer class of people of the country, the single man even, with his income of $1,000 a year, and the married man with his income of $2,000 a year, we know, and know too well, that under existing prices the burden and the hardship brought about on account of the increased prices fall upon that class of our citizens most heavily. Mr. President, with his hardships increased, with his opportunity of making a little accumulation lessened, with his opportunity for giving better educational advantages to his children decreased, with the opportunity of the married man to make brighter and more happy the home diminished, it seems to me that the Senate committee should not say to that man, unfortunate as he is on account of the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, "We do not propose to allow you an exemption of over $1,000 a year, if you are a single man, or, if you are a married man, an exemption of more than $2,000 a year before we begin to make you contribute to the tax burdens of your country."

Mr. President, my observation has been that the great rank and file of the people of this country who enjoy only small incomes are as patriotic, that they are as loyal, that they are as good citizens as we have within our Republic. They are always ready to respond to their country's call; they are always ready to do their duty as American citizens. They have contributed and will continue to contribute to the maintenance of our great system of government. They have been the very backbone of the country; they have in times of peace, in times of war, in periods of success, and eras of peril been true to their country and our institutions and American freedom. They will willingly, they will uncomplainingly at any and all times rally to the flag and bear any necessary burden which may be inflicted upon them by their Government. There is now, however, talk about making this war unpopular; some have intimated that those who are solicitous for the man of small means in this country may be disloyal to their country, that they want to make the war unpopular; but I tell you, Mr. President, that in considering the American people, in considering whether this war shall be popular or unpopular, we must consider the manhood of this country as well as the wealth, as well as the dollars that may be stored up in the Nation.

We must evidence a proper consideration for the great masses of our country, and I am firmly convinced that it is unnecessary, that the policy is not a correct one to seek to impose income taxes upon small incomes.

I have no ill will toward wealth and capital. They have been potent factors, as I have before stated, in the development of the country. It will be necessary, of course, for enterprises to be enlarged, for plants to be extended; but we can increase these rates of taxation and still at the same time allow the wealthy class of this country sufficient income to enjoy their usual comforts, to enjoy their ease and their luxuries, if they wish, and at the same time extend and enlarge their business operations. If, however, you put a tax burden upon the humble citizens of this country with an income of only $1,000 in the case of single men and only $2,000 in the case of married men, you will necessarily add to their hardship; you will necessarily take away from them the opportunity to do something that will bring about a greater degree of happiness and comfort in their own homes. For that reason, Mr. President, deeming that it is not necessary to make the exemptions so small, I have offered this amendment to increase from one to two thousand dollars the exemption in the case of single men and from two to three thousand dollars exemption in the case of married men or married persons.

It was stated by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] yesterday in his very able address upon this subject that the wealth of this country represented, quoting identically his language, "the organized savings of the people." I think, Mr. President, that he was possibly correct in that definition; but if he was correct in that definition, and if wealth represents the organized savings of the people of this country, then to what other source could we more equitably and more justly turn to place the taxation to supply the revenue needed by the Government? I admit that wealth represents the organized savings of the people; it does not merely represent income upon investments; it does not merely represent the fruits of the ingenuity and business sagacity of the men who may be at the head of business institutions, of the men who may to-day enjoy the big possessions and the enormous incomes, but within that accumulation of wealth we find the organized savings of the people of this country.

The wealth of the land represents the efforts of the great masses of the people; it represents the fruits of labor; it represents the proportionate part that has been contributed by the producers and laborers of the Nation in building up our immense wealth. I have never yet, in dealing with governmental problems, been able to work myself into a frame of mind or to cherish a sentiment which would permit me to forget the man who has always been instrumental in building up the wealth of the land.

I believe that the burden can be more equitably and more reasonably imposed by increasing taxes on incomes. I thought that the same thing was true in regard to war profits. I believe at the present time that by increasing these rates we can eliminate from the bill the taxes imposed upon coffee, tea, sugar, and other commodities consumed by the great masses of the people, which taxes if not eliminated will reach into every home throughout the American Republic. Considering, as we necessarily must, the fact which we know to be true, that a very large majority of the people of America are people of very ordinary means, consumption taxes will necessarily impose a burden upon people who can ill afford to bear it, and impose it, Mr. President, when it is unnecessary. I believe that the system which will reach those who are most capable and able to bear the burden, instead of those who can ill afford to bear it, is the proper one, and for that reason I have consistently been voting to increase the rates upon war profits and upon individual incomes, and propose to-day to support amendments providing for an increase in the tax upon incomes. I shall also vote to eliminate the tax on coffee, tea, sugar, sirup, and also to eliminate the tax on parcel-post packages, freight and express receipts. I was one of the Senators who voted against the efforts to raise letter postage from 2 to 3 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but before voting on his amendment I desire to see if I understand it thoroughly. The old law provides for an exemption of $3,000 in the case of single men, and $4,000 in the case of married men. The exemptions under the bill now before the Senate are $1,000 in the case of single men and $2,000 in the case of married men. As I understand, the amendment of the Senator from Florida proposes to increase the exemption to $2,000 in the case of single men and $3,000 in the case of married men. Is that correct?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Now, as I understand, the committee bill not only reduces the exemption to $1,000 and $2,000, respectively, but it adds an additional 2 per cent tax to that imposed by the old law. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I thank the Senator for the information.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I rather think the Senator from South Dakota labors under some misapprehension as to the bill. The bill as proposed reduces the exemption for the purposes of the additional 2 per cent tax only; in other words, a single man would pay 2 per cent on his income in excess of $1,000 up to $3,000, and a married man would pay a 2 per cent tax on his income in excess of $2,000 and not exceeding $4,000. Then the old law would step in and apply the 2 per cent which it imposes, with the same exemption which the old law carries; in other words, a 2 per cent tax is imposed on the income of an unmarried man between $1,000 and $3,000, and above the $3,000 the additional 2 per cent normal tax applies, and in the case of the married man the bill imposes a tax of 2 per cent on his income between $2,000 and $4,000 only, and on his income above $4,000 the 2 per cent tax provided by the existing law attaches.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I think the explanation made by the Senator from New Mexico is correct. My amendment does not seek to raise the exemption to the amount provided by existing law, but it seeks to raise it from $1,000 to $2,000 in the case of single men and from $2,000 to $3,000 in the case of married men, which will be, of course, a reduction of $1,000 in each instance from the exemption allowed under the existing income-tax law.

Mr. President, I yield to no man in my loyalty to our country, I yield to no man in my anxiety and my desire to see this Nation successful in the present conflict, and it is now and has been my object ever since we became involved in the war to contribute my influence, to contribute my vote toward bringing it to a successful termination. Of course, however, I have endeavored to stand for those policies and those measures which I conscientiously believed were proper.

We necessarily, Mr. President, regardless of our patriotism, regardless of our love of country, differ upon the details of the measures which may be necessary in the prosecution of the war. I do not impugn the motives of any Senator who may differ from me; but it is my conviction, it is my conscientious belief, that as we deal with the different subjects and different policies which are necessary we should be as mindful of the interests of the great rank and file of the people of this country as we are of the wealth of the country. If we are to maintain prosperity, if our country is to continue to go forward in its marvelous march of development, then we must bring contentment, we must bring happiness, not merely to one class of our citizenship, we must not be mindful merely of the interests of those who may perchance be so fortunate as to control and dominate the wealth of the country, but we must remember the great rank and file of the people who are making but a meager living at the best.

I say, Mr. President, that the prosperity of the country does not depend upon the more fortunate wealthy class, even though they are potent factors in its development and in its prosperity; but we will have a more prosperous country, we will have a happier people if we consider justly and equitably the interests of all classes. If the farmer, the laboring man, the artisan, the man in the office, the merchant, and the people of great wealth, all march shoulder to shoulder and are justly treated by the American Congress, that will bring about a greater degree of prosperity; that will make this war far more popular than to allow the great fortunes, the fabulous war profits, of the country to be exempt from a considerable part of the burden, and in consequence of such exemption necessitate imposing it upon those who can ill afford to bear that burden.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish briefly to call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the pending amendment. I do this because a number of Senators have requested that I should speak briefly upon the amendment, calling attention particularly to the rates and to indicate the effect of the rates.

Some days ago, before the amendment was introduced for the purpose of having it considered in connection with the bill, I presented it and asked to have the amendment printed in the RECORD, together with tables showing the tax which an income at each bracket would pay, the actual rate per cent, and the total amount of revenue which would be raised under the amendment. Senators will find these tables in the RECORD of August 27, on pages 6378 and 6379. If Senators who are interested will examine these tables I believe they will find there answers to any of the queries they may desire to make regarding this amendment, and more in detail than at this time I should feel warranted in doing upon the floor.

I do not care to add anything to what I have already said upon the principle of raising a larger amount of war revenue by taxation. To go into that matter again, in my judgment, would not contribute anything to this debate, and I have no disposition to take the time of the Senate away from other Senators who desire to speak upon other amendments. But I will say, regarding the pending amendment, that it will raise upon individual incomes $162,000,000 more revenue than will the provisions of the committee bill affecting individual incomes, as amended by the changes made yesterday and the changes of the so-called Lenroot and Gerry amendments. In other words, taking the committee provisions as to individual incomes as now before the Senate and comparing them with the amendment which I have offered, there is this difference:

The total amount of revenue that would be collected under the amendment as I have offered it in round numbers is $162,000,000 more than would be collected under the provisions as they have been changed by the committee up to the present time. The earlier brackets of my amendments make very small assessments upon the smaller incomes and the amendment proceeds by a fraction of one-half of 1 per cent until the tax touches incomes in excess of $20,000 when the increase is made by three-fourths of 1 per cent for each increase of $1,000 in income until incomes in excess of $30,000 are reached. Then the advance is made at the rate of 1 per cent per bracket. In the table I have had computed the exact rate per cent which would be collected from a given income, and the total tax that a given income would pay, starting with the $3,000 income of a married person.

A $3,000 income would pay $20, or a rate of 0.66 per cent.

A $5,000 income would pay $80, or a rate of 1.6 per cent.

A $6,000 income would pay $125, or a rate of 2.08 per cent.

A $7,000 income would pay $175, or a rate of 2.5 per cent.

An $8,000 income would pay $230, or a rate of 2.87 per cent.

A $9,000 income would pay $290, or a rate of 3.22 per cent.

A $10,000 income would pay $355, or a rate of 3.55 per cent.

An $11,000 income would pay $425, or a rate of 3.86 per cent.

A $12,000 income would pay $500, or a rate of 4.16 per cent.

A $13,000 income would pay $580, or a rate of 4.46 per cent.

A $14,000 income would pay $665, or a rate of 4.75 per cent.

It may be interesting for Senators to know what the British rate would be on an income of that precise amount. It would be 29½ per cent, instead of 4.75 per cent.

Upon an income of $15,000 the total tax would be $755; the tax rate would be 5.03 per cent; the British rate would be 30 per cent and a fraction. I leave off the fraction.

Upon a $16,000 income the total tax would be $850, the rate 5.31 per cent; the British rate 30 per cent.

Upon a $17,000 income there would be paid a tax of $950, the tax rate being 5.59 per cent. The British tax rate, if applied to that income, would be 30 per cent.

An $18,000 income would pay $1,055 as a total tax; the rate per cent would be 5.86; the British rate would be 30 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KING. Are not the percentages just suggested by the Senator as being within his amendment and relating to incomes from, say, six or seven thousand dollars up to twenty thousand dollars, considerably less than those fixed in the committee's bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator has made that comparison—

Mr. KING. I will state to the Senator, if he will pardon me, that I read them, not having the two before me, however, at the same time, and my recollection is that the figures or percentages of the Senator from Wisconsin are very much less within the brackets just given by him. I was going to suggest whether if that were true, he did not think his percentages were too low upon the incomes ranging, say, from $10,000 to $20,000 or $25,000?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will hand to the Senator from Utah the minority report. Upon page 237 he will find a table giving the actual rate and the amounts which would be collected on certain incomes. It does not cover completely, as the Senator will see, all of the incomes embraced within the provisions of the proposed bill, but it is figured out for incomes of given amounts. If the Senator will give the rate, for instance, upon a $10,000 income, as that is figured out in that table, I can then make the comparison which he wished to have instituted.

Mr. KING. The total tax under the present law would be $120.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not care for the present law. Will the Senator just omit that and go to the last two columns of figures?

Mr. KING. Three hundred and fifty-five dollars, or a percentage of 3.55.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At that point the rates in my amendment and the rates in the committee amendment agree. What is the rate figured out upon an income of more than $10,000 in the table which the Senator has before him?

Mr. KING. On an income of $7,000 the total tax is $180 on the percentage of 2.57.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The $7,000 income, as shown by this table, would pay under my amendment a total tax of $175 and at a rate of 2.5.

Mr. KING. There would be $5 difference in the tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So up to the $10,000 income the rates in the amendment proposed by me are not higher and some of them, I think, are lower than the rates proposed by the committee.

The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] calls my attention to the bill as giving the rate of 2 per cent up to incomes of $10,000. If that be so, then the rates in the table furnished by the majority of the committee are not correct. I am taking it from the table of the majority of the committee furnished to the junior Senator from Utah. Will the junior Senator from Utah take an income higher than that? What is the next income above $10,000 given there?

Mr. KING. The next income as shown by the report which the Senator from Wisconsin tendered me is $12,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the majority report?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What is the total tax paid?

Mr. KING. Four hundred and ninety-five dollars, and the percentage is 4.12.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under the amendment which I have proposed the tax on a $12,000 income would be $500 and the tax rate 4.16 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. So that there will be no misunderstanding, I will suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin the figures the junior Senator from Utah is reading not only take into consideration the percentage in the pending bill, but the present law, and both added together, of course, will amount to what the junior Senator from Utah states.

Mr. KING. Yes; the figures I gave would be the total tax—the tax under the proposed bill and the tax under the existing law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The table from which I am reading shows the total tax that would be paid on the income, and that includes existing law as well as the added rates proposed in my amendment.

Mr. KING. So I understood the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, if the Senator cares to pursue the subject further, will he give me the next?

Mr. KING. I should like if the Senator will pardon me, to make an inquiry as to an income of $20,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon $20,000 under the amendment as proposed by me the total tax paid would be $1,290 and the tax rate 6.45 per cent.

Mr. KING. That would be somewhat higher than the present tax plus the tax that would be imposed by the bill submitted by the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will give me that, I should like to have it.

Mr. KING. One thousand two hundred and thirty dollars, and the percentage 6.15.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A difference of only $70 in the total amount of tax paid.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator. That covers the points I had in my mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will not take the time of the Senate, unless some Senator should request me to do so, to read all of the different brackets shown in this table, but I will give the amount of the total tax which will be paid on an income of $25,000. It would be $2,027.50, and the actual rate per cent of taxation upon an income of that amount would be 8.11. Upon a $30,000 income the total tax would be $2,917.50 and the rate per cent 9.83. That would leave to an individual with an income of $30,000, after paying his income tax, in round numbers, $27,000 untaxed, upon which he, I should think, might worry along for the year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. By practicing economy.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. By practicing, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, rigid and strict economy in the management of his household. Senators will see how moderate are the increases which I propose. They do not in any degree meet the amount which I believe should be exacted from these incomes, but I am endeavoring to present rates which will commend themselves to the Senate and will increase the revenue to an amount which the Senate will be willing to vote into this bill.

Upon a $40,000 income there would be paid, under the amendment I have proposed, a total tax of $5,497.50, and the tax rate would be only 13.74 per cent.

Upon an income of $50,000 there would be paid $9,117.50. The tax rate would be 18.24 per cent, leaving to the recipient of the $50,000 income $40,000 untaxed.

Upon a $100,000 income a tax of $30,617.50 would be taken by the Government at a tax rate of 30.62 per cent.

Upon an income of $1,000,000 the actual tax paid would be $530,000. The tax rate would be 53.06 per cent.

Upon an income of $2,000,000 the actual tax paid would be $1,195,617.50, and the rate would be 59.78 per cent.

Mr. President, the total tax collected from individuals under the committee amendment now before the Senate is estimated to be but $481,000,000. The total tax that would be collected under the amendment which I have proposed would be $643,000,000, in round numbers.

I am very anxious, Mr. President, to see the taxes upon incomes raised sufficiently, so that, with the increase which has been made in the tax upon corporations, the war-profits tax, and the excise tax, and with increases which I hope will be made when the bill reaches the Senate adding still more, an amount will be realized from these sources sufficient to enable us when it comes to the final issue to strike out of the pending bill every consumption tax in it and still leave an amount which will be more fair and just as the amount which should be paid in taxes in comparison with the amount of money that must be raised by the sale of bonds than the bill was when reported by the committee or than it is now as changed by the Senate.

Mr. President, I believe it is worth while for Senators who desire that this measure shall receive the approval of the country to consider carefully, when the bill gets into the Senate, the question of increasing somewhat more the war-profits tax and of increasing now the tax upon incomes.

Mr. President, the Senate does not have the final decision upon the fiscal policy which this Government is to pursue. The Congress is not the final arbiter upon this question. After all, the people of this country must approve what we do if we successfully finance this war. If we should pursue a policy here that permits the wealth of the country to escape bearing its full proportion of the burdens that war brings to us, and should lay upon the people not only consumption taxes approaching a half a billion dollars, but upon top of that, by the small amount of taxes which the bill provides, drive straight toward an inevitably large bond issue that will mortgage the mass of the people to the wealth of the country for the next century to come, when the Treasury goes out to sell bonds it may be found that the people of this country are not willing to bend their backs to the burden of future taxation to meet an enormous bond issue that would not be necessary if there were levied in this bill taxes that would put a just share of this burden upon war profits and surplus incomes. The people will have this matter very well worked out in their minds. They will understand that of the vast sum that is carried in the bond issue with the interest added it is likely to be double in amount before the bonds are finally paid. They understand that when the Government mortgages itself by an enormous bond issue to the wealth of the country it is placing upon the mass of the people an involuntary mortgage that they must work out and sweat out to pay. The total amount of money that will be paid in the end will be double or more than double the amount that will be paid if the taxes to carry as large as possible amount of the war expenditure as can be were laid now upon the wealth of the country. This could be done without in any degree working injury to the industrial efficiency of the country or injustice to business or to the individuals who enjoy the surplus incomes that would be reached by the pending amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether the amendment which he has now pending corresponds with the provision in his substitute for the entire bill relating to the income tax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It corresponds with the income-tax provisions which I have incorporated in the substitute bill, upon which I hope to get a vote later in the consideration of this measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I thought.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to take just a short time to call attention to some facts. I do not know whether they have been adverted to in the discussion or not. I have not heard them.

I hastily looked over the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Gronna], and I think he gave the figures showing the persons who would be affected by the different gradations in the bill probably as reported by the committee. I have endeavored to segregate these figures and show how many would be affected by the provisions in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as compared with the bill reported by the committee. I think it would be interesting to have in the Record a statement with reference to the number of persons affected, especially in view of the suggestions that have been made here that we are going to make this bill very unpopular by increasing the income and other taxes. That charge was made when we were voting upon the Lenroot amendment in this income-tax section and after we had rejected the committee amendment striking out the Lenroot provision.

Mr. President, according to the Statistical Abstract, there were 336,652 persons who returned incomes subject to the income tax for the year ending December 31, 1916.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that the descriptive matter at the head of the table in the volume which the Senator has is incorrect in this, that instead of the calendar year it should be the fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Washington is right.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know, of course, as to that. I merely took the statement at the head of this column. It reads: "Personal Income Tax."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is put in calendar years; but the matter was brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury or the collector of internal revenue by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who is not now on the floor, who directed a letter to the department making particular inquiry about this table and the caption matter which the Senator from Washington has just read. The Senator from Nebraska told me that he expected to put that letter into the Record upon yesterday in the course of his remarks. I may not be correct in my recollection of his statement of the error in that caption, but there is an error in it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But I take it that the table, anyway, is right as to the last returns.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The figures are correct; but whether they relate to the calendar year 1915 or to the fiscal year 1916 I am not certain.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then we will take the figures, anyway, the last returns from the Treasury Department, showing the number of people who were affected by the income tax. Those figures show that the number was 336,652. Mr. President, so far as we know those are all of the people who were affected by the income tax. This bill begins at incomes of $5,000 and over. According to this report, included in those 336,652 persons were 69,045 with incomes from $3,000 to $4,000 and there were 58,949 persons with incomes from $4,000 to $5,000. None of those persons are affected by the bill reported by the committee under the first bracket in this income-tax section, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Washington does not want to be wrong.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not. I want to be right.

Mr. SMOOT. The additional tax begins on incomes of $5,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. SMOOT. But the normal tax affects all those persons named by the Senators and a great many more, because the exemption as to incomes proposed in the bill is $1,000 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man, as against $3,000 for a single man and $4,000 for a married man under existing law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But, of course, we have not finally passed on that suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I think the Senate will.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am speaking of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. SMOOT. The lowering of the exemption will bring in over a million people.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; I know that; but I am not talking about that; I am merely talking about those who have heretofore paid taxes on their incomes, and who will be affected by the increased taxes which in this bill it is proposed to raise from incomes. Of course if we extend the tax to those who have only an income of $1,000 or $2,000, we shall bring in a great many more; but that is not done according to the law now. I merely want to analyze the figures, so far as applied to this proposed law, as nearly as I can as compared with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would the Senator think of extending it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will express myself on that a little bit later. When it comes to a vote, that proposition will come up; but I hope I shall not be diverted to any of those other matters in this connection. So right at the start 127,994 persons are not affected by some of the proposed income-tax increases by the bill of the committee or by the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin. That leaves 208,658 with incomes of $5,000 and above. That is not a very large number of persons—208,658—and even if they should be dissatisfied, as they will not be, that will not cause any very widespread revolt; but now, beginning there and comparing this bill with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, he begins by imposing one-half of 1 per cent on incomes of $5,000 and up to $6,000, while the committee makes it 1 per cent. So his amendment is not quite so high as the committee amendment in that respect, and on incomes up to $10,000 the rate in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is substantially the same as that of the committee. The committee rate on incomes above $7,500 and up to $10,000 is 2 per cent; the rate of the Senator from Wisconsin is 2 per cent up to $9,000, and then it is 2½ per cent from $9,000 to $10,000, so that there is no substantial difference. These provisions and brackets cover 120,402 individuals, according to this report, leaving 54,154 people to be affected by the rates further on. That is not a very large number, and there will be no dissatisfaction from those 120,402 persons by reason of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, because it makes no substantial increase over the proposal by the committee. Taking incomes of from $10,000, where the rate is 3 per cent under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, up to incomes of $15,000, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes a tax of 5 per cent on incomes of $14,000, while the committee proposes a rate of 4 per cent, an increase of only 1 per cent under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. Some of the other rates on incomes within those limits are less under the committee amendment than under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. By the tax on incomes up to $15,000 the number of persons affected is 282,498, and there is no substantial increase by reason of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin on any of them. So we may not expect any especial disapproval from those 282,498 people.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. It was stated by the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SIMMONS] that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would bear most heavily upon the people with small incomes. I have hurriedly run over the columns of the figures given by the Senator from Wisconsin, and I want to state, if the Senator from Washington will permit me, that from incomes below $25,000 there would be $198,013,872 collected, and from incomes between $25,000 and $30,000 there would be collected $36,542,730 more, or, in all, $234,556,602 out of a total of $850,043,772. So if these figures are correct it is not true that it would bear more heavily upon the people with the small incomes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How about the last bracket?

Mr. JONES of Washington. In the last bracket the two amendments pretty nearly come together.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The last bracket of my amendment is identical with the committee provision, because I adopted the Gerry amendment as a part of this amendment after the Senate had voted unanimously for it. I think it might well be higher, but having the unanimous approval of the Senate, I attached those brackets to my amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, what I am trying to do is to bring out the facts with reference to the number of people who will be affected by these proposals by the committee and the Senator from Wisconsin. This shows that out of 336,652 there are 282,498 included up to the income class of $15,000. Upon some of them the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is a little lower than the committee amendment, and finally it is just 1 per cent higher upon the incomes from $14,000 to $15,000. Beginning at $15,000—

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will it disturb the Senator if I interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has correctly stated the number of people who are affected by the income tax. I think he said the number was 336,652.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Now, if we add to that the number of people affected by the corporation tax, which, according to the last Statistical Report, was 190,911, the total number who could be affected both by the war-profits tax and also by the income tax would be 527,363.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to dissociate the war-profits tax from the income tax for the purpose I have now. I am having nothing to do with the war-profits tax. I am merely considering the income-tax proposition, although I am glad to have the facts to which the Senator calls attention put in here.

Mr. GRONNA. It has been stated that we are making this war unpopular because we are endeavoring to increase the rate of taxation on incomes of those who are paying the tax, but the total number who would be affected by any rate of taxation is a little more than half a million.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but I merely wanted to call attention to the facts with reference to the income-tax proposition, because I think that will really emphasize it sufficiently.

Beginning now at incomes of $15,000, the committee rate is 6 per cent, while the rate under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is only 5½ per cent. So the rate under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is a little less than under the committee amendment; but the committee rate of 6 per cent continues on incomes from $15,000 to $20,000, while on incomes from $19,000 to $20,000 the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin imposes a tax of 7½ per cent, or just 1½ per cent more than the committee amendment.

The number affected within those limits—incomes between $15,000 and $20,000—is 16,475; so that of those reporting incomes up to $20,000, as affected by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and by the provisions of the committee amendment, there would be 298,973. They would be affected in substantially the same way under both proposals, leaving 37,679 people to be aroused to anger by reason of increased rates under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin if adopted and to make this bill unpopular throughout the country. I do not think we need have very much to fear from them even if they should be angered, as I am sure they would not be.

Now, how are they affected? Beginning with incomes of $20,000, the rate of the committee is 8 per cent, while the rate of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is 8½ per cent; that is all; a slight increase. The committee rate of 8 per cent continues right along on incomes from $20,000 to incomes of $40,000. Senators talk about inequalities. Of course it is impossible to work out any system under which there will not be some inequalities; but I venture to assert, Mr. President, that under the plan of the committee there will be many, many times the inequalities that will come from the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Under the committee proposition a man whose income is $20,000 a year pays the same proportionate rate as the man whose income is $30,000; he pays at the same proportionate rate as the man whose income is $35,000 a year, and he pays at the same proportionate rate as the man whose income is $40,000 a year. So if you are going to try to arrange these matters so that they will be exactly equitable, you fail to do it by the committee proposition, while under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as a man's income increases $1,000 the rate is increased a little bit. Therefore the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is much more equitable among the class of people having incomes of $20,000 up to $40,000 than the committee provision.

How many people are affected in the class of those receiving incomes of from $20,000 to $40,000? I have not figured that exactly, but the number receiving incomes of from $20,000 to $25,000 was 9,707; the number of those receiving incomes of from $25,000 to $30,000 was 6,196; the number of those receiving incomes from $30,000 to $40,000 was 7,005, which makes, in round numbers, 23,000 people affected from the $20,000 income limit to the $40,000 limit.

While the rate provided by the committee of 8 per cent continues up to the $40,000 income, the rate of the Senator from Wisconsin for the $40,000 income reaches 26 per cent.

Mr. President, it will be seen that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin makes a substantial increase in the tax on incomes from $20,000 to $40,000; but, as has been often stated on this floor, the man who is receiving an income of $20,000 a year or $40,000 will not be worried by the slight increase that is made here. He is not going to suffer either for lack of food or lack of clothing or lack of the comforts of life; he will not make any sacrifice whatever in paying this increased tax. I desire to repeat what I said yesterday, that these men will make no objection to it; they will make no complaint at increasing this tax; they will be glad to pay it. A man receiving an income of $40,000 a year is not going to object to this 26 per cent tax proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Then, beginning at $40,000, the tax under the committee provision is 10 per cent, merely an increase of 2 per cent over the rate on incomes of $20,000, and that 10 per cent tax continues on incomes between $40,000 and $60,000, while under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin the rate is increased from 26 per cent to 34 per cent. The increased rate on incomes from $40,000 to $60,000 a year will affect 4,100 people—that is all.

There is not very much ground there for fear that this bill will be made unpopular throughout the country by raising those rates. I do not advocate raising any of these rates because there are few people to be affected; not at all. I favor putting it on for the same reason that the committee proposes to put that rate on. I am simply showing how little ground there is for the belief of the committee as expressed by its chairman, that increasing these rates would make this bill unpopular.

Then, beginning at incomes of $60,000, the committee amendment provides a rate of taxation of 14 per cent, which has been increased by our accession to the House provision and the increase the Senator from North Carolina made yesterday. The rate proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is 35 per cent. That is a very substantial increase over the committee amendment, but that affects incomes of $60,000 up to $80,000 and is not going to cause very much trouble.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. New in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. In just a moment. I can not find from this book how many people paid taxes upon incomes between $60,000 and $80,000, because that particular class is not covered, the figures given applicable to the terms of these proposals being for those receiving incomes between $50,000 and $100,000. So I took those brackets, and I find that there are 6,847 people in that class. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I do not quite understand the statement of the Senator from Washington with respect to the per cent under the existing law and the bill tendered by the committee upon incomes of $60,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not talking about the existing law at all; I am merely saying that the committee on incomes from $50,000 to $60,000 imposes a tax of 10 per cent, while the rate proposed under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin reaches 34 per cent. I am not talking about the existing law at all; I am merely comparing the committee proposal with the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin; that is all that I am comparing.

Mr. KING. Then, the increase would be over 20 per cent on that class of incomes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; there would be quite a substantial increase there.

Then on the incomes of $80,000 and not exceeding $100,000 the committee now proposes a tax of 18 per cent, while the Senator from Wisconsin proposes a tax of 36 per cent; and the number of people affected between $50,000 and $100,000 would be 6,847.

The next bracket is those having incomes from $100,000 to $150,000. There the committee proposes a tax of 22 per cent, and the Senator from Wisconsin a tax of 37 per cent. How many people would that affect? What widespread dissatisfaction would that bring to the different sections of the country, assuming that every one affected would be dissatisfied? Why, that would affect just 1,793 people—that is all. Scatter them all around over this great country of ours and you are not going to get very much of a revolutionary sentiment out of those people; and you are not going to get very much of a revolutionary sentiment out of people who are getting $100,000 to $150,000, either, if you take up to 37 per cent of their incomes. You won't find any.

Then in the bracket from $150,000 to $200,000 the committee fix a tax of 25 per cent, while the Senator from Wisconsin fixes the rate at 38 per cent. They are coming together. How many people are affected by that? Just 724, according to this report.

Then the next bracket is incomes from $200,000 to $250,000. There the committee rate is 30 per cent, and that of the Senator from Wisconsin 39 per cent. They are coming still nearer together. But how many are affected in that bracket? What source of dissatisfaction will we have from that? Three hundred and eighty-six—that is all. Spread those 386 people around among the different States of the Union, and you will not have very much of a riot anywhere.

Then the next bracket is incomes from $250,000 to $300,000. The committee rate is 34 per cent, and the rate proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is 40 per cent. But how many people does that affect? What tremendous revolutionary sentiment will be developed by this slight increase? It affects 216 persons. Just 216 persons will rise up in their wrath against the Congress for imposing a 6 per cent increase upon their incomes of $250,000 to $300,000 a year upon the theory of the Senator from North Carolina.

The next bracket is incomes from $300,000 to $500,000. The committee amendment provides for a tax of 37 per cent, and that of the Senator from Wisconsin 41 per cent. How many persons does that affect? Three hundred and seventy-six; that is all. Why, if the whole 376 were in the State of Michigan they would not cause very much of an eruption there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose they were all in the State of Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If they were there they would not cause any trouble. I wish they were there—they would welcome this increase and a greater one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps some of them are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, I do not know. Let me see; I will tell about that in a minute. No; we have not any of them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Indeed! I supposed the Senator had a number of them in Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; we have not any. We have not any persons with incomes between $400,000 and $500,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then the patriots the Senator is praising do not live there.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No. I wish they did live there. There would not be any dissatisfaction on account of this rate if they did—not a bit of it—any more than there would be in the State of Michigan. There would be none there. They would cheerfully pay it, and pay a higher rate, if necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They would squirm a little, but they would pay it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They would not squirm very much in this crisis of the Nation's history.

Then take the next bracket, those having incomes of $500,000 to $750,000. There the committee fix a rate of 40 per cent, under compulsion—or, if they do not admit that it was done under compulsion, I will admit that it was done voluntarily and cheerfully and gladly—while the Senator from Wisconsin raises it to 42 per cent, an increase of only 2 per cent. There is no report here upon incomes between $500,000 and $750,000, so I do not know how many would be affected there; but the next bracket is from $750,000 to $1,000,000. There the committee amendment fixes a rate of 45 per cent, and the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin fixes a rate of 45 per cent; so that unless the action of the committee works a revolution throughout the country the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will have nothing to do with causing such a disturbance. Now, how many persons were affected by these two brackets, from $500,000 to $1,000,000? Just 209 persons, and, Mr. President, I venture the assertion that these 209 men are just as patriotic as any other 209 men you can find throughout the country, no matter how small their incomes may be. Patriotism is not measured by wealth or poverty and I have no sympathy with the suggestion that the rich are less patriotic than the poor. The trouble is that many here seem to act on the theory that wealth must be given more consideration than poverty. This is wrong; we should not do it.

The next bracket covers incomes above $1,000,000. Of those incomes the committee takes 50 per cent, and the Senator from Wisconsin takes 50 per cent. How many persons are affected by this? Just 120 persons; and if they are dissatisfied with the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin they will be dissatisfied with the amendment of the committee, because it makes no difference which is enacted into law.

So, Mr. President, I fear nothing in the way of dissatisfaction throughout the country by reason of the changes made by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I think it is much fairer, much more equitable, than the proposal of the committee, because it comes nearer imposing the tax in proportion to the ability of the man to pay it, and in proportion to the income that he receives, than the amendment of the committee. I can see no substantial objection to it. It will raise $160,000,000 more from those able to pay it. It will go that far toward withholding burdens from the future. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see a higher rate upon incomes, as I suggested yesterday; but possibly this is as much as we can hope to get, and therefore I am glad to get it in preference to the other.

I will say, Mr. President, that I think the committee proposal is much better than the bill as it came from the House, and I am glad that we have fixed rates that we feel reasonably sure that we are going to get; that are above the House rates. I am not opposed to what we have; but I want to see them raised, if possible, and I have no fear of a national uprising if we do make some increase.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted, of course, that the Senator's remarks have reference to the people affected by the income tax, not by the bill itself.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why, certainly. I thought I made that plain. I am just talking about the first title in the bill, the first section. That is all I am talking about.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, as far as any statement is concerned about causing dissatisfaction in the country, I never made such a statement—

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that.

Mr. SMOOT. And I have no sort of sympathy with it; but I suppose the Senator who made that statement had reference to the bill as a whole. I want to say to the Senator, allowing present exemptions, that there will not be as many persons affected by the income tax under this bill as there have been in the past, because when you take into consideration the fact that a corporation with 120,000 stockholders, instead of having its profits distributed as a whole, with the exception of the 2 per cent normal tax, is now burdened with a tax of 46.9 per cent on an average, of course the Senator can see that that will affect the income of every stockholder in that concern. They will not get the dividends that they have been receiving in the past, and therefore their income tax will not be so great as it has been in the past.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just a moment. I simply want to say that I am not going into that discussion. I merely wanted to make a comparison between the proposal of the committee and the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin. What the Senator says just now will apply to the committee proposal just the same as it will to the proposal of the Senator from Wisconsin, if the bill is enacted as we have framed it.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, all I wanted to say in reference to that is that the Senator from Utah is in error as to the provision that was pending when the remark was made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to which the Senator from Washington has been directing his observations throughout his discussion of this matter. The statement was made by the Senator from North Carolina in his speech, which was delivered on this floor, in opposition to the first amendment which I offered to the income-tax provision. It was an amendment that collected a smaller rate on incomes throughout than the amendment which is presented now; and the remark was directed to that, and not to the bill generally. The bill generally was not under consideration. That was the only thing that was under consideration. It was a comment and a criticism upon the attempt to increase the income tax as being directed with a purpose of rendering this bill unpopular, and creating dissatisfaction in the country against the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not say whether that statement was made upon any particular amendment or not—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I can.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, however, that the Senator had in mind the taxes that were imposed in the bill and not in any one title.

I am not going to discuss that matter, because it is neither here nor there, nor did I rise for that purpose. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that the number of persons affected by the income tax if the exemptions were $3,000 and $4,000, as they are to-day, would not be as great as has been stated here by the Senator from Washington; but, of course, if the bill contains an exemption of $1,000 and $2,000 instead of $3,000 and $4,000 there will be affected not only the number that has been named by the Senator from Washington, but there will be over a million more persons affected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator does not understand that I dispute that statement. I was not discussing that phase of the matter at all. Of course, everybody knows that if we lower the exemption we will have more to pay on income tax.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table. I desire to give notice that to-morrow at 12 o'clock I shall ask to be permitted to submit some observations in regard to the amendment. It relates to a proposed progressive inheritance tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have been very much gratified with the course which the debate has taken this morning. There seems to be no disposition on the part of anyone to talk for the mere sake of talking. I think the effort has been to understand the differences between this bill as reported by the committee and the changes suggested by the amendments. I think it is timely that a short statement should be made from the point of view of the committee.

We all realize the enormous task which confronts the Senate and, of course, which confronted the committee in framing such a bill. This bill as reported will tax the people of this country to the extent of about two and a half billion dollars. Taken in connection with the existing revenue law, we propose to gather from the people of this country between three and a half and four billion dollars. It has not been long since there was a great protest going up over the country concerning the expenditure of a billion dollars for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the Government, but here we are seeking to raise nearly $4,000,000,000. We realize the importance of the task which is before the country not only to pay these taxes but to carry on the business of the country, the activities of the country, and to do the things which are necessary to be done in order to carry on the war. In this view the committee have undertaken to consider the various lines of industry so that they shall not be interfered with any more than absolutely necessary in order to raise the amount of revenue which it was felt necessary to raise at this time.

Mr. President, there is a common phrase known to the people of the country regarding revenue bills, and, while it is a homely phrase, it expresses the sentiment which has actuated the members of this committee. It has been the effort of the committee to "pluck the most feathers and produce the least squawking." We have sought to raise as much revenue as could be raised without serious interference with business in this country.

As to the rates which shall be imposed, there is no way by which you can with mathematical certainty demonstrate the amount which should be fixed. The little colloquy which I entered into a day or two ago with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hollis] was for the purpose of emphasizing that point. No man can say with mathematical certainty that the rate upon a given income should be a definite amount. You can not say whether it should be 15 per cent or 16 per cent. You can not say whether it should be 15 per cent or 20 per cent. The most that can be done is to exercise sound judgment in view of the information which we have regarding the conditions of business in this country. It was precisely that thing which the committee did. It considered the business interests of the country, the interests of different lines of business, and the bill which is reported here after consideration and after reconsideration has presented these schedules as the sound judgment of the majority of the members of that committee.

The changes which are sought to be made here by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as stated by the chairman of the committee in a previous discussion of this bill, bear more heavily upon the smaller incomes. I do not mean by that the smallest incomes, but those of modest proportions. We find on an examination of the amendment, as compared with the bill as reported, that up to $20,000 there is very little difference between the percentage of tax imposed under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and the committee bill, but when we come to incomes between $20,000 and $40,000 we find that he has increased the percentage from 8 per cent by 17 per cent in that bracket. It varies. There is an increase beginning with $20,000, extending up to $40,000, which amounts finally to an increase of 17 per cent. I mean 17 per cent of the total income, not a proportionate increase. But the committee fixes the percentage up to $40,000 at only 8 per cent, whereas the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin raises that in his last bracket over 17 per cent, making it 35 per cent on the man with an income of $39,000. On the bracket between $40,000 and $60,000 the committee puts a tax of 10 per cent. The Senator's amendment increases that upon those incomes from 10 per cent up to 34 per cent, an increase of 24 per cent, or much more than double the amount of tax imposed by the committee bill.

After that is done, after you get up to incomes of $60,000, then the increases proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin do not increase in the same proportion. They run in this way: Between $20,000 and $40,000 the increase is 17 per cent; between $40,000 and $60,000 the increase is 24 per cent; between $60,000 and $80,000 the increase is 18 per cent; between $80,000 and $100,000 it is 15 per cent; between $100,000 and $150,000 it is 13 per cent; between $150,000 and $200,000 it is 9 per cent; between $200,000 and $250,000 it is 6 per cent; between $250,000 and $300,000 it is 4 per cent; between $300,000 and $500,000 it is 2 per cent; and above $2,000,000 there is no increase at all. So it is literally true that the increases made by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin do bear most heavily upon the modest incomes.

Now, argument has been presented, statements have been made, that a man with $20,000 income can not be hurt by the amount of tax levied upon him by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. An effort is made to have us believe that $20,000 is an enormous income; that $40,000 is still more of an income; that people with such incomes could revel in luxury and pay 25 or 30 or 40 per cent without realizing it; that you could get that many feathers without any squawking.

But, Mr. President, I am fearful the Senators fail to realize the source from which such modest incomes come. These incomes do not drop from the trees. At least more than one-half of them are the profits of industry, and the income itself in practically all such cases is not represented by dollars in the bank; it is represented by increased activity, increase in plant, increase in the machinery, increase in the resources which tend to increase production. It is not dividends, it is a mere increase in business. When you speak of a man with a modest income of $30,000 or $40,000 it represents an addition to his industry. He hopes to increase his production. He wants to be encouraged just as much as the corporation wants to be encouraged which keeps money in its business. So when you levy these taxes you do bear down hard upon these men when you require that they shall take actual cash out of their business and turn it over to the Government.

Mr. President, I listened to the argument of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], in which he tried to minimize the amount of hardship which would come from the levy of these taxes. He undertook to tell us the small number of people who would be actually affected. I want to say in the beginning that such an argument as that does not appeal to me in the slightest degree. If there should be only one citizen to be affected in this country by this tax, I should not want to do him an injustice. The fact that they do not count many votes at November elections should not make the slightest difference in the imposition of this tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the statement the Senator just made most heartily, but I wish to call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Washington, who is not now in the Chamber, made that argument, as I understand it, in rebuttal of the argument against the proposed amendment that it would make the law and the war unpopular.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I, of course, understand the way in which the Senator from Washington sought to meet the statement, but would it not make it unpopular if the people of this country realized that we are imposing an unjust thing upon one man or any small number of men? I submit that it would arouse resentment in the breasts of the people of this country the same as it evidently has in the breast of the Senator from Nebraska. The people of this country want justice done, and it matters not the small number of people to be affected by it.

Moreover, Mr. President, the amounts which these few people pay are not insignificant. The Senator from Washington stated that those paying incomes between $20,000 and $40,000 were only 23,000 in number. He said that would not hurt much; you would catch only 23,000 people. But, Mr. President, those 23,000 people would pay in taxes under this bill $34,352,600; and that is not all. Most of these men are engaged in business. They are producing the things which are necessary to carry on this country of ours, supporting the people, and supporting this war. Not only are they engaged in business, but that same business is met with another phase of this bill. Doubtless the same people who pay that $34,000,000 will pay other large sums under the excess-profits tax. Your excess-profits tax—the war-profits tax, as it is sometimes called—bears upon the business of the individual precisely the same as upon a corporation. So with a partnership. These are not all the taxes, then, that these 23,000 people will pay under this bill.

Mr. President, it is impossible, as I say, for anyone to demonstrate that this percentage should be one amount or any other amount; but in consideration of the different business interests of the country, what the people are doing who make these modest incomes, the committee has tried to do its best. I imagine that if the individual Senators felt themselves free to prepare a schedule or a scale of these income taxes there would be as many different schedules as there are Senators in this body. I imagine that no two minds would exactly agree upon all these schedules. I do not believe it is possible for such a thing to happen. So what can you do upon a question of this kind, which is a mere matter of percentage, a mere matter of judgment? Shall you leave it to the individual judgment of each individual Senator when you know that that does not bring about a meeting of the minds, that it would not ascertain the majority judgment of the Senate? Then what can you do? Shall you take the judgment of the Senator from Wisconsin or the judgment of some other Senator and consider that as against the judgment of several Senators who have considered these figures and given to us their honest and best consideration?

It is upon that ground that I appeal to Senators to support the recommendations of your committee. These matters, to my mind, must be left to a committee to consider. They are mere exercises of judgment; and while I do not mean to say that any member of the committee is entitled to more consideration than any other Member of the Senate, yet it does seem to me that after several Members of the Senate have gotten together and after weeks of consideration—and not only consideration, but reconsideration—have reached a conclusion, it bears evidence of more exact justice than the estimate of any one Senator.

Mr. President, while I have the floor I think it is advisable to refer to a very small extent to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. He proposes to raise the exemption of married men from $2,000 to $3,000 and of single men from $1,000 to $2,000. Of course that involves merely a matter of judgment, but let us see how this affects the people coming within that class. Under the bill as reported by the committee an unmarried man is entitled to an income of $1,000 without any tax. If he earns more than $1,000—if he earns as much as $2,000—then the amount of the tax is only $20.

If he earns as much as $3,000, the amount of the tax is only $40. With the married man, if he earns $2,000, he pays no tax; if he earns as much as $3,000, he pays $20; if he earns as much as $4,000, he pays only $40. Does it look as if that would be a great hardship upon those individuals?

In the same connection it is argued that we should eliminate the consumption taxes from this bill. I do not propose to discuss that matter at this time. I do not know whether the consumption taxes would find themselves resting as a burden upon the consumers of the country or not. It seems to me the sugar and the coffee situation is such that those who handle those commodities will get all that the traffic will bear anyhow. But if it should to some limited extent increase the price of sugar and coffee and tea, Mr. President, I go upon this principle, that in a time like this not only every citizen of this country should be called upon to do something for the country but every citizen should deem it a privilege to do at least something for the country in this great crisis, and so with these people. Why should not the unmarried man with an income of $2,000 feel proud that he is called upon to pay $20 of that to the maintenance of the war, and so the married man with $3,000 that he should pay $20? Mr. President, to the masses of the people of this country who consume the tea and the coffee and the sugar, the amount of it, even if the consumer does pay it, is so infinitesimally small that it should have no serious bearing upon the living expenses of any of them. Under those circumstances do not those people of modest means who do not come within the income-tax law of the country want to feel that they have at least a small interest in carrying on the war? So, in the cup of coffee or the cup of tea, if the widow could feel that in that there was at least a mite contributed to the support of the country in time of war, I should think she would feel proud of the opportunity.

So, Mr. President, the committee presents this bill. We have tried to do right, to raise the revenue in such manner as to cause the least injury to the taxpayers of the country, and we submit it to the consideration of the Senate. I do not believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin should be adopted. I think the proposed increases upon the modest incomes of the country are too high, and I trust, Mr. President, that the Senate will come to the conclusion that we should not tax these modest incomes in such way as to bear heavily upon the business interests of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. HOLLIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gronna	New	Smoot
Borah	Hale	Norris	Sterling
Brady	Hollis	Page	Sutherland
Brandeggee	Husting	Penrose	Swanson
Calder	James	Poindexter	Trammell
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Ransdell	Vardaman
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Reed	Wadsworth
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Saulsbury	Warren
Curtis	Kellogg	Shafroth	Watson
Dillingham	Kendrick	Sheppard	Williams
Fernald	Kenyon	Shields	Wolcott
France	La Follette	Simmons
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Smith, Md.
Gerry	Martin	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a table that has been used a great deal in this discussion, found in the Statistical Abstract of 1916, and to what, in my mind, is no doubt a typographical error. The table is No. 366 and is found on page 648. It purports to give the incomes of persons having a net income in excess of $3,000 for the year ending December 31, 1916. That ought to be 1915.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Perhaps the Senator is not aware that on the 20th or 21st of August, in remarks that I made to the Senate at that time, I filed the figures in a brief form for the use of the Senate and they were published in the RECORD at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not do away with the fact that this table has been very often used. I undertook to get similar information for 1916 from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue some time ago and was unable to get it, because he said they had not been able to compile it yet from the records.

If Senators will notice the Statistical Abstract for 1916, the volume to which I have just made reference, the date of the letter of transmittal, January 1, 1917, states the income tax is not paid by persons in the United States until the 1st of January, 1917, for the calendar year of 1916, and the taxpayer has until the 1st of March, 1917, to pay the tax of 1916. So it would have been impossible, as is shown on its face, for this table to have been compiled at the time of the transmittal of this report, because the returns were not yet in. But to be sure about it, I took the matter up with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by telephone after I had had an answer to my letter that he was unable to supply similar information for 1916, and he said that in this table one of the brackets was wrong. The last column states the amount as being $1,900,000 and over, but it ought, instead, to be one million. With that correction, all of the figures in the table are correct for the calendar year of 1915 instead of the calendar year 1916, as the table shows.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent from the Senate in order to say good-bye to his son, who is sailing for France. He has a pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WADSWORTH (after having voted in the negative). I voted without explaining that I transferred my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who, if present, would vote as I shall on this question. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] on this amendment. If present, the Senator from Tennessee would vote for the amendment and the Senator from California would vote against the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is unavoidably absent on account of sickness, to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). As announced by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], but with the understanding that if I could arrange a transfer of pairs it might be done. Therefore I transfer my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. As it has been announced that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, if present would on this question vote as I shall vote, I felt at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 55—as follows:

YEAS—19.

Borah	Husting	McNary	Sutherland
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Thompson
Gronna	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Trammell
Hardwick	Kenyon	Reed	Vardaman
Hollis	La Follette	Sheppard

NAYS—55.

Bankhead	Gerry	Nelson	Simmons
Beckham	Hale	New	Smith, Ga.
Brandeggee	Harding	Overman	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Hitchcock	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Calder	James	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Sterling
Colt	Kellogg	Pittman	Stone
Curtis	Kendrick	Pomerene	Swanson
Dillingham	Knox	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fall	Lewis	Robinson	Warren
Fernald	Lodge	Saulsbury	Watson
Fletcher	McCumber	Shafroth	Williams
France	Martin	Sherman	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Shields

NOT VOTING—22.

Ashurst	Hughes	Newlands	Townsend
Culberson	Johnson S. Dak.	Phelan	Underwood
Cummins	King	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh
Gallinger	Kirby	Smith, Mich.	Weeks
Goff	McKellar	Thomas
Gore	McLean	Tillman

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am about to offer an amendment to this title which will raise about $80,000,000 more than will the committee amendment, and not so much as the amendment which has just been rejected. I will say briefly that my amendment begins to increase the committee's schedule with incomes of $25,000 and meets the committee's schedule on incomes of $500,000 and over. I have changed one paragraph in order to meet the committee's schedule on incomes between $250,000 and $500,000; that is, I have changed my 35 per cent schedule to 37 per cent. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500.

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000.

Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500.

Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000.

Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $17,500.

Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $17,500 and does not exceed $20,000.

Seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $22,500.

Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $22,500 and does not exceed $25,000.

Nine per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $25,000 and does not exceed $27,500.

Ten per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $27,500 and does not exceed $30,000.

Eleven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $32,500.

Twelve per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $32,500 and does not exceed $35,000.

Thirteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $35,000 and does not exceed $37,500.

Fourteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $37,500 and does not exceed $40,000.

Fifteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $42,500.

Sixteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $42,500 and does not exceed $45,000.

Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $45,000 and does not exceed $47,500.

Eighteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $47,500 and does not exceed $50,000.

Nineteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $52,500.

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $52,500 and does not exceed $55,000.

Twenty-one per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $55,000 and does not exceed $57,500.

Twenty-two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $57,500 and does not exceed $60,000.

Twenty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $62,500.

Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $62,500 and does not exceed $65,000.

Twenty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $65,000 and does not exceed $67,500.

Twenty-six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $67,500 and does not exceed $70,000.

Twenty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $70,000 and does not exceed $72,500.

Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $95,000 and does not exceed $100,000.

Thirty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $250,000.

Thirty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $500,000.

Forty per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.

Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.

Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the amendment which I have submitted represents an endeavor to accommodate the two ends of the income-tax schedules that have now been adopted by the Senate. The Senate voted unanimously to place an income-tax on incomes from $500,000 to $750,000 at 40 per cent, and an income tax of 37 per cent on incomes of from $250,000 to $500,000. In my amendment I adopt those schedules, or, to put it more accurately, the committee has adopted two of my schedules—the 40 per cent and the 45 per cent schedules.

I then begin with the committee's schedule of 1 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500. I then follow the committee amendment until I reach incomes of $25,000. I then begin to add, with the same process that the committee has followed, until I reach incomes of $75,000. On incomes above $75,000 I increase by jumps of $5,000 until I get to where the committee amendment imposes a tax of 37 per cent.

The effect of this amendment substantially is to increase the committee schedules on incomes between $25,000 and $250,000 a year. For example, take an income of $50,000. Under the committee amendment the percentage is 10.8 per cent; under my amendment it would be 13.1 per cent; under the amendment just rejected it would be 18.2 per cent.

On an income of $100,000, under the committee amendment, the rate would be 16.4 per cent; under my amendment it would be 23.8 per cent, and under the amendment just rejected it would be 30.6 per cent; that is, as between incomes of from $50,000 a year to $100,000 per year the committee amendment increases the rate 52 per cent; my amendment increases the rate 82 per cent, and the La Follette amendment increases the rate 66 per cent. My amendment is practically midway between the committee rate and the La Follette amendment as to incomes between $25,000 and $250,000.

This is the last chance the Senate is going to have to increase the percentage of tax on the higher incomes. The Senate has insisted on imposing a graduated income tax on corporations, but in so doing they did not tax men of large incomes any more than they taxed men of small incomes, because the rate was imposed on corporations; and the larger the corporation, as a rule, the greater the number of stockholders and the smaller the holdings of each stockholder; whereas the stock of very profitable corporations is closely held, the investments are large, the incomes are large, and the rate is low. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] pointed that out very plainly yesterday. So far in the income tax on individuals we have taxed the very small property holder just as high as we have the very large property holder, and we are going to be met hereafter in the consideration of this bill with the statement, "Oh, you have put an enormous income tax on corporations and now you have got to let up on them all down the line," and if we do not put a large income tax on individuals it is going to be said, "Why, you can not cut out the consumption taxes, and you can not adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to increase the exemption from $1,000 in the case of the single man and $2,000 in the case of the married man, as proposed by the committee, to $2,000 and $3,000, respectively."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to call attention to an amendment which I shall offer before we vote this afternoon to this effect:

SEC. — That section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended by adding at the end of subdivision (a) a further paragraph No. 9, to read as follows:

"Ninth. Contributions or gifts actually made within the year to corporations or associations organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, or to societies for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, to an amount not in excess of 20 per cent of the taxpayer's taxable net income as computed without the benefit of this paragraph. Such contributions or gifts shall be allowable as deductions only if verified under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The effect of that amendment will be to permit a wealthy man to contribute to charitable, educational, and scientific institutions, and then when he comes to make up his income-tax returns to make a deduction from his gross income of the amount that he has contributed for those purposes, not to exceed 20 per cent of his entire net income. I believe that the Senate will see the necessity for voting that exemption in war times.

I have myself been on the other side of this proposition that colleges, hospitals, and charitable institutions should be supported by private contributions. I myself had the privilege of going to a large school. Before I went there I supported myself entirely for two years. I went there and received a tremendous amount of benefit; I enjoyed my experience there; but what I contributed in tuition did not begin to pay my share of the expense, and I never felt comfortable that I had been there because of private bounty. I have tried since I graduated to make it up by contributions to class funds and teachers' funds, and so on, so that I feel that I am square with the college; but I should have felt much better if I had gone to an institution which was supported by public taxes. So I am on the other end of this proposition ordinarily; but what have we done? We have permitted these institutions to grow up and become firmly established on the plan of depending upon private contributions. Now, however, the war affects those institutions more seriously than it does any other character of institution. The soldiers we draw come very largely from our colleges. I have seen no estimate, but I should imagine that fully one-half of the students will be taken out of the large institutions because of the war, and it is going to be a very serious problem whether they can be kept open at all. I understand ex-President Taft has written to the committee stating that, in his judgment, institutions like Hampton Institute will be seriously handicapped unless this amendment is adopted.

It will work in this way: Usually people contribute to charities and educational objects out of their surplus. After they have done everything else they want to do, after they have educated their children and traveled and spent their money on everything they really want or think they want, then, if they have something left over, they will contribute it to a college or to the Red Cross or for some scientific purposes. Now, when war comes and we impose these very heavy taxes on incomes, that will be the first place where the wealthy men will be tempted to economize, namely, in donations to charity. They will say, "Charity begins at home."

I should not favor allowing any man to deduct all of his contributions to these objects from his income-tax return, but if we limit it to 20 per cent of his income we can not be doing much harm to the Public Treasury.

Look at it in this way: For every dollar that a man contributes for these public charities, educational, scientific, or otherwise, the public gets 100 per cent; it is all devoted to that purpose. If it were undertaken to support such institutions through the Federal Government or local governments and the taxes were imposed for the amount they would only get the percentage, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 40 per cent, as the case might be. Instead of getting the full amount they would get a third or a quarter or a fifth.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, if he is going to continue with the discussion of his second amendment. I desire to ask him something about his first amendment, which I will do after he gets through discussing the amendment to which he is now referring.

Mr. HOLLIS. I will be through that branch of my discussion in a moment.

Mr. President, I have many letters from men who have been prominent in charitable work, from men in the Red Cross Association, from all of the larger colleges, and from many charities in all sections of the country. I ask that I be permitted to insert in the Record without reading, instead of these letters, editorials in favor of this amendment from the Washington Post, the New York Times, The Survey, and the Boston Transcript.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that these letters refer to the amendment in relation to the donations which may be made for charitable purposes?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; they refer to that.

Mr. SMOOT. And they have no reference to the Senator's pending income-tax amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. They do not relate to the income-tax amendment. I will say frankly the reason I am speaking about the second amendment now is that I do not know that I shall get an opportunity to speak upon it before the vote is taken, and I desire to explain it. I ask that the editorials to which I have referred may be printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorials referred to are as follows:

EXEMPTING CHARITY.

The Senate was expected to reduce somewhat the high income-tax rates which the House approved in adopting the Lenroot amendment. It has, however, voted to retain the Lenroot rates in the war-revenue act, and may even increase them. This gives added importance to the amendment to exempt from the tax, by means of allowable deductions, gifts for charitable, educational, and religious purposes, which the Senate must soon vote upon and which it will do well to adopt. Such deductions are limited to one-fifth of the individual's otherwise taxable income.

The proposal means that, while the individual is asked to give up a large part of his income to the Government, which will determine what is to be done with it or how it is to be spent, and presumably in this emergency will devote it chiefly to effective measures for winning the war, he will still have the privilege of giving up one-fifth of his total income to war purposes, the Red Cross relief, or to humanitarian, educational, or public objects which he may elect and in which he may exercise a choice as to how the money shall be spent.

If the Government takes all, or nearly all, of one's disposable or surplus income, it must undertake the responsibility for spending it, and it must then support all those works of charity and mercy and all the educational and religious works which in this country have heretofore been supported by private benevolence.

It would be a mistake to change abruptly the traditional policy under the stress of war conditions. This country can not abandon or impoverish the great structure of private charity and education that has been one of the most notable achievements of American civilization. Therefore with every additional dollar the Government finds it necessary to take in taxation it becomes increasingly necessary to accept the principle of the pending amendment and leave untaxed that part of every citizen's income which he may give voluntarily to the public good.

[From the New York Times, Aug. 24, 1917.]

THE CONSCRIPTION OF WEALTH.

The emotionalists at Washington and elsewhere, especially those who are opposed to the war, have had a great deal to say about "taxing wealth" and "the conscription of wealth." Every tax is a tax on wealth or income. Every tax is a conscription of wealth or income. Taxation is not a subject for rhetoric, fine frenzies, or phrases. The expenses of the Government being greatly increased by the war, taxation must be greatly increased. During the Civil War, after 1862, and for some three years after its close, the internal-revenue receipts were greater than the customs receipts. These are the two main sources of Government revenue. The case was the same in the Spanish War. Normally the customs receipts have exceeded the internal-revenue receipts, though in the last few years the conditions have been reversed on account of the inheritance tax and the income tax. The latter, urged by many of its advocates as an "emergency tax," was imposed before the emergency arose. Now, when there is supreme emergency, it is right that the tax should be increased. It is right that the taxes on large incomes should be increased.

It is the prevailing theory of taxation that every person's payment to the Government should correspond with his resources. Increased income taxes are sound economically to the extent that they will furnish a great revenue. If they are increased to such an extent that trade and industry, the productive sources of income, are injured, they are unsound and pernicious.

These are sober truisms to be kept in mind in judging the Senate's action on Wednesday in overturning the Senate Finance Committee's income-tax schedule except as to incomes under $60,000 and providing an ascending graduated scale from 13.75 per cent on incomes between $60,000 and $80,000 to 50 per cent on $1,000,000 or over. Since the amendment of Senator GERRY providing a supertax of 35 per cent on incomes from $500,000 to $750,000, or 45 per cent on those from $750,000 to $1,000,000, of 50 per cent on those above that sum, was passed by a vote of 74 to 0, it is to be concluded that the Senate has no compunctions as to the amount of "conscription" to which great incomes should be subject. In one day the Senate voted to add $75,000,000 to the income taxes, which, as laid in the Senate scheme at present, are expected to reach the enormous sum of $850,000,000. The Senate gave up the other day the $12,000,000 it was proposed to raise on stamp and parcel-post taxes, easily borne and widely distributed. A small "conscription" but a just one, the congressional objection to which is unfathomable.

On large incomes the tax seems to be laid on the principle "of all the traffic will bear." Senator LODGE's caution against too swift imposition of rigorous income taxes was eminently wise. We are but just beginning what may be a long struggle. We should be careful not to exhaust the sources of revenue. We must not rely on taxation too largely for war expenses or make taxes so high that they can not be made higher at need later.

There is a necessary social effect to this taxation of great incomes. It diminishes or dries up the springs of philanthropic eleemosynary and educational life. The foreign calls on charity and benevolence since the war began have reduced contributions to American educational and humane works. The presidents of the colleges, whose incomes from tuition and dormitory fees will be notably lessened by the war service of so many collegians, so many "rich men's sons," and sons of the well to do, are in grave perplexity. A rich man can spend only so much on himself and his family. Out of his surplus come his regular gifts for public purposes. This is a consideration to be regarded in income-tax legislation. Not that in the common defense much or all property and life may not be required of a citizen. Only in laying income or any other kind of taxation let prejudice and passion be put aside. As a matter of economics and finance is a particular amount of tax desirable and necessary?

Rich men are doing and willing to do their part in this war. They are ready to pay, some of them have already paid, their children's lives to the defense of democracy; and they should be taxed, and are willing to be taxed, high. They ought not to be maligned in addition. The few men at Washington who habitually insult wealth and "the rich" are trying to divide a country in which all patriots should be united. It will not escape attention that the bitterest plutophobes are usually opponents of the war or seekers of a dishonest and fatal peace.

[From "Social forces in war time," by Edward T. Devine, The Survey, July 7, 1917.]

EXEMPTION OF CONTRIBUTIONS.

The Hollis amendment to the war-revenue bill, authorizing the deduction of gifts to educational and charitable corporations from gross income along with certain other deductions, such as taxes and bad debts, does not create a new form of special privilege or a new subsidy. It does not enable a wealthy man to secure a lower income-tax rate, nor does it violate any established principle of taxation. There is no presumption that any lessening of revenues attributable to this amendment would increase the burdens of those who have small incomes. The difference may quite as well be made up by increasing the tax on war profits.

What the Hollis amendment does is to save the revenue bill from penalizing gifts to colleges, churches, and charitable agencies. By means of this exemption contributions to recognized religious, charitable, and educational institutions are put on the same basis as the loss of money in business, or the payment of money in taxes. Since the taxpayer, or the bad investor, or the donor does not have the use of the money, he is not asked to pay the income tax on it. In the first case it is taken from him by the State; in the second, he loses it involuntarily; in the third, he parts with it voluntarily for a public or social purpose. In no one of the three does he in fact have the money from which to deduct the amount of the income tax. If required to pay it in the third case, as he is not in the other two, he must take it from some other source. Every gift to philanthropy, in other words, costs the donor not only the amount of his gift but a substantial sum in addition.

Of course the added expense can be deducted, if the donor chooses, from the amount which he had intended to give; but in that case it ceases to be an income tax and is instead a tax on the philanthropic institutions. The time may come when the Government will have to choose between national defense, on the one hand, and the continuance of educational and philanthropic institutions. We may have to turn our schools and hospitals and playgrounds into battleships and ammunition. That time has not yet come even in France. To begin the war tax with burdens on universities, settlements, and other voluntary social agencies is analogous to the wonderful scheme for making industries more efficient by removing the legislative protection of women and children and thereby reducing the productive power of labor.

[From the Boston Transcript, June 29, 1917.]

DO NOT PENALIZE GENEROSITY.

In simple justice and for the national welfare the United States Senate should promptly write the Hollis amendment into the taxation bill. This would remove the absurdity of exacting a tax even on that share of a man's income which he devotes not at all to himself, but to the pressing needs of educational and charitable institutions which operate without private profit. The exaction of such a tax is, at this time, worse than an absurdity. Under the conditions obtaining to-day it would be a form of calamity. It passes beyond individuals and strikes at America's whole organization for social progress and education, the relief of distress, and the remedy of evils.

In America, as perhaps nowhere else in the world, educational and philanthropic institutions have been built up and maintained by private subscription. This has been due in part to the rapid growth of the country, but still more to the splendid tradition of individual and volunteer service which has been established here. In many countries of slower development the Government has assumed most of the burdens of work for the people's welfare, one by one as the need appeared. Upon the occurrence of war the Governments so charged remain responsible. They have incurred the obligation and must still find ways to meet it as best they are able. Even so, the responsibility continues in America, if anything enhanced and not decreased by the war, but it continues at the charge of the many private agencies which have assumed the work. Unlike the Government, moreover, these agencies can not raise their necessary funds by fiat or taxation. They must continue to depend in large part upon private gifts. Meanwhile the Government's special needs for the conduct of war will be cutting sharply into this very source of supply on which so much of our welfare depends.

In this predicament the very least which the United States Government can do is to leave these sources of supply as wide open as still may be possible. It should not continue to tax men and women upon that part of their income which they freely give to the Nation's social and educational work. It should not put a penalty upon generosity. In all the privately endowed colleges boards of trustees have not only to face a probable decrease in the total of gifts received but they will also have less from tuition fees—thanks to the loyal help they have given in urging students to enter the Government's services for war. At Harvard next year's deficit is roughly figured at $200,000. The urgency of the situation is plain. Not a day should be lost in accepting and passing the Hollis amendment.

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 1, 1917.]

POPULARIZING TAX BURDENS.

The Senate Finance Committee must add several hundred million dollars—perhaps a billion—to the revenue bill which it is expected to report this week. That means increasing the rates of the war-income tax, the war excess-profits tax, finding new objects of taxation, or issuing more bonds. The needs of the Government outlined by Secretary McAdoo must be met. There are billions to be had for the war, but not a dollar for waste or extravagance. The people will pay cheerfully any sum, no matter how large, which the Government can spend wisely and economically in the vigorous and successful prosecution of the war. There is patriotism enough to assure that, but the ensuing taxes will be popular or unpopular in proportion as the people feel that Congress is scrupulously careful to safeguard economy and efficiency in public expenditures and is just and fair in distributing the burden of the tax as between individuals upon whom it must ultimately fall.

A case in point is presented in support of the two amendments which, respectively, allow deductions from taxable income of gifts to education, charity, and religion, and exempts from the Federal estate tax bequests and legacies for the same purposes. The increased demand for revenue is an added reason for and not against granting these deductions and exemptions, which may mean a loss of from $5,000,000 to $100,000,000 of revenue annually to the Government.

It is good social psychology, Dr. Lindsay argues, to assume that five or ten times the loss, whatever it may be, can be levied in increased taxes upon the taxable portion of the same incomes or estates and will be more cheerfully paid by reason of the simple act of justice and consideration implied in the granting of the deductions and exemptions.

The primary purpose of the amendments is, of course, to safeguard the continuance of the valuable public work of educational, charitable, and religious institutions in this hour of need and to enable them to meet the new demands the war will make on them. Only secondarily do they consider the incidental effect of the deductions and exemptions upon the donors or contributors whose generosity and public service they so justly recognize. This ought not to be overlooked when burdens of such magnitude are piling up. Generosity and fairness on the part of Congress will beget liberality and cheerfulness on the part of the taxpayers.

The Senate Finance Committee in its eagerness to get added revenue will show farsighted statesmanship and not be lacking in an appreciation of sound social psychology if it gives up the revenue it would lose by adopting the proposed amendments. It can easily capitalize in this bill or in others soon to follow the good will such action will create in the minds of taxpayers. It will thereby make a good investment.

[From the Washington Post, July 12, 1917.]

CONSCRIPTION OF INCOME.

The Hollis amendment to the revenue bill, which would exempt charitable, scientific, educational, and religious bequests from the income tax, wisely follows the terms of the similar exemption contained in the existing taxes on corporations. In order that an individual may not avoid taxation completely by giving his whole income to a charitable institution, the Hollis amendment provides that the exemption shall apply only to 20 per cent of the income.

If a man with a $2,000,000 income wished to give 20 per cent of it to charity, the Government under the proposed exemption might lose a little revenue, but it would be infinitesimal compared with the amount that would be given to the public.

Back of the present taxation program lies the theory that wealth as well as man power must be conscripted for the war. This is a sound theory. But just as the selective feature is the very essence of conscription of man power, so it should be regarded as the important feature of conscription of income.

In conscripting men the Government takes careful account of the work they are now doing. The Government does not call out men who are needed in the war industries. It will not call men on whom families are absolutely dependent for support. The basic idea is to avoid unnecessary burdens. If men with dependent families were taken by the Army, the burden of supporting those families would fall on the State.

The same rule should apply to the income tax. Where necessary public institutions are supported by private subscription, the State is saved much money. Voluntary contributions to the Red Cross, for instance, have saved the Government $100,000,000, and eventually will save the Government much more. Where money is already performing useful service for the Government, it ought to be exempted. It would be disastrous if any educational and charitable institution aiding the Nation in peace and war should fail because of a nearsighted policy of Congress.

Shall the Government frame its tax measures so far as possible to put the tax upon the luxuries of the rich rather than upon the benefactions of the rich? The argument is not that benefactions should be encouraged by legislation, but that they should not be discouraged by penalties. To say to the man who gives $10,000 to the Red Cross that he must pay a penalty on the gift is to discourage private generosity and throw the burden upon the shoulders of the Government itself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator if he would have any objection to reducing the limitation in his second amendment to 15 per cent instead of 20 per cent? I refer to the amendment which he has just been discussing, with reference to donations to charitable and educational institutions. The Senator provides in that amendment a limitation of 20 per cent. I ask the Senator if he would be willing to reduce the limitation to 15 per cent?

Mr. HOLLIS. If the committee will accept it, I will; otherwise I prefer not to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am inclined to accept it for the committee, if the Senator will reduce the limitation to 15 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he accept it right now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will accept it now if the Senator will consent to reduce the limit to 15 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. Very well; I will do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, on behalf of the committee, I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is not now before the Senate. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire relating to the income tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment in regard to donations to charities, and so forth, is not now before the Senate, but I was simply in advance suggesting that I would accept it at the proper time.

Mr. HOLLIS. I will offer it with the 15 per cent limit.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand, the pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire with reference to the income tax.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to know if I correctly understood the Senator to say that his amendment will raise about $80,000,000 additional to the amount estimated to be raised by the committee amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. That much more than the committee schedule. I will give the Senator the figures. The committee originally estimated that their income-tax provision would yield $417,000,000. Then they accepted the Gerry amendment, which added substantially $40,000,000 more, and the so-called Lenroot amendment, which added substantially $20,000,000 more, so that the committee proposal will now produce about $470,000,000. Mine will produce about $557,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator overlooks the fact that we also, by an amendment, raise the revenues from the income tax $180,000,000 by increasing the corporation tax from 4 to 6 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. Oh, no; I did not overlook that. We have disregarded that right through. The corporation tax is entirely different from the individual income tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, Mr. President, the bill as now framed will yield to the Treasury, according to the estimates, an additional sum on account of corporate incomes and individual incomes of $840,000,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. Very true. We are now talking about the income tax on individuals, however; and the point I wish to emphasize is this: By agreement of the committee we are now going to exempt from taxation gifts to charitable, educational, and scientific institutions not to exceed 15 per cent of the donor's income. Now, that is going to cost something. I expect that the committee will adopt the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] increasing the exemptions to $2,000 and $3,000. That is going to cut out about $16,000,000; and I offer my amendment in order to take care of that, because just as certainly as we do not increase these individual income taxes to take care of those two items there will be claims made later on on other items that we have cut as much as this out of the bill, and Senators who intend to vote against these consumption taxes on mother's tea and father's coffee and baby's cocoa ought to bear that in mind. This is the only chance you have to impose a larger tax on the man of large income. You do not do it on the graduated income tax; you have declined to do it; and this is the only chance you will get to lay a larger share of taxation on larger incomes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. VARDAMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is true that this is the last chance while the bill is in the Committee of the Whole to increase the rates of taxation on incomes. Taking into consideration the heavy tax imposed upon excess or war profits, the taxes that are now proposed by the Senate substitute are such that the tax upon the business of the country, or the profits, whether of corporations or individuals, is so high that it would seem to me that any Senator who had regard for the future prosperity of the country would hesitate and positively refuse to increase them.

We have heard a great deal about conscription of property, about coining flesh and blood into profits, and Senators have undertaken to impress the country with the idea that every Senator who has not voted for the extreme rates embodied in these amendments is not willing to conscript the wealth of the country, but is willing that the business concerns of the country shall coin into profits the flesh and blood of those who are called into war. Such an insinuation is not worthy a Senator, and we all know the reasons for making them.

Mr. President, we are raising by this bill a higher percentage of the expenses of the war by direct taxation than any other country in the world has ever raised or is at present raising. I voted for the draft law, Mr. President; and before the night of the following day closed I felt it my duty to offer my services to my country in any position that would be to my country's advantage. I spoke to Senators upon this side of the Chamber and Senators upon the other side of the Chamber; I telegraphed to my friends at home, and said that I felt, as long as I had voted for the draft, that it was my duty to offer my services to my country in the capacity which would be of the greatest service to her. In every case, Mr. President, I was advised that I could do more for my country in the position I now occupy than in any other position I was capable of filling.

Mr. President, I have two sons. I expect to see both of them in the war. I have not asked for them anything different than I would ask for the son of the humblest parents in this country. You will not find either one of my sons claiming exemption because they are married and have two children, as both of them have. If they are drafted—and I expect both of them will be—they will enter the Army as soldiers; and if it becomes necessary for them to give their lives in order to maintain the honor and liberty of their country, they will be satisfied, and so will I. Like every other father, I pray to God that such a thing may not happen; but if necessary, and such a thing happens, I will not utter a word of complaint. So, every vote I have cast upon this bill has been a vote that in my judgment will assist my country in caring for all her defenders in the present war; and not only that, but to care for the industries of the country, so that we may have a prosperous and a united people. I know of no greater service that could be rendered to the Kaiser than for us, through legislation, to cripple the industries of the country.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the facts as they exist in relation to this legislation, what the appropriations already made are, what they are likely to be, based upon the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, what revenue we shall receive, and then how we should meet it, in my judgment.

The appropriations already made are $9,124,433,107.11; the estimated appropriations to be made, $9,891,150,000, or a total of appropriations of $19,015,583,107.11. Mr. President, included in the appropriations are the following items which either will not be paid out of the appropriations made, for reasons that I will give, or for advances to foreign countries, upon which they will pay the interest and the principal to our Government.

The repeal of the first War-Risk Insurance Bureau law, $10,000,000. That law was repealed, and there was an appropriation made later of a greater amount, and both of them are included in the amount of the appropriations that I named.

The interest to be paid by foreign Governments, $170,000,000, upon moneys that we intend to loan to them.

The sinking fund of $60,000,000.

The loan to the allies of $7,000,000,000.

Or a total deduction of $7,240,000,000. Taking that from the $19,015,583,107.11, it leaves as the amount of appropriation to take care of the war and running expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, $11,775,583,107.11.

How is this to be met? First by the revenue to be raised. Under existing law we will raise $1,333,500,000. From the pending bill we will raise $2,500,000,000. In passing I want to say that there is no question in my mind but that the actual amount will be more than that. From the post-office receipts, $325,000,000. The appropriations made for the running expenses of the Post Office Department are included in the appropriations that I have already named. So we will collect at least $4,158,500,000, which would leave $7,617,083,107.11 to be met by a bond issue if the revenues are not more than I have stated.

Mr. President, I am not going to call the Senate's attention to the fact that a great deal of this $11,000,000,000 appropriation can not be expended by June 30, 1918, but simply state that it is a physical impossibility to do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator aware that, as I understand, a large portion of the $3,500,000,000 that we appropriated earlier in this session has not yet been expended?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; a great portion of it, Mr. President; and out of the amount yet to be appropriated, if the policy now adopted is carried out, the Government of the United States will have to buy machinery, it will have to erect buildings, and after that will have to begin the manufacture of the guns that will be used in the present war. I say it is a physical impossibility to spend all of the money that is being asked for by the estimates, and I think the heads of the departments will frankly admit it. I believe, however, that the appropriations ought to be made, in order to cover all necessary contracts, and the money must be appropriated before the department can enter into such contracts.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the junior Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CALDER. Can the Senator from Utah enumerate some of the items that we will not be called upon to expend money for during this fiscal year?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we can not spend the money appropriated for the Navy by the end of this year; or, in other words, the contracts that have already been entered into from the appropriations made can not be completed within that time. Again, I feel positive that it is a physical impossibility to have made by June 30, 1918, the number of 9-inch guns, and in this connection will state that we will require of all sizes 16,000 guns. The appropriations should cover every contract. I think that is the proper policy to follow; that is the policy the department has followed and recommended, and that is the policy your committee recommends; and the items I have named cover every dollar of contracts that will be made by all departments of our Government, based upon the estimates made.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CALDER. So that the money raised by this bill and those already enacted may equal one-half of all the money expended this year, exclusive of our foreign loans?

Mr. SMOOT. It may probably do so, Mr. President. Now let me proceed.

The total to be raised by direct taxation under the pending bill and existing law is $4,158,500,000. The balance of the appropriations that will be made, if we cover every estimate made by the department, will amount to $7,617,083,107.11. Now, what are the percentages even on that basis? The percentage to be raised by direct taxation is 35.3 per cent. The percentage to be raised by bonds is 64.7 per cent.

Now let me call the attention of the Senate to the percentages raised by direct taxation by other countries involved in the present great war. They have been in this war for three years, and we are just entering it:

England, 26 per cent.

France, 14½ per cent.

Germany, 14½ per cent.

Canada, 8 per cent.

The United States, 35.3 per cent.

In the speech that was delivered this morning by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] he commented upon the taxation that would be imposed upon incomes of $2,000 and above. There will be no income taxes on incomes of $2,000 or less in case of a married man. He mentioned $2,200. Why, Mr. President, under this bill, if the man in question were a married man and if he had an income of $2,200, how much tax would he pay? Four dollars a year. Is there a man in the United States drawing $2,200 a year that would refuse to pay $4 toward the expenses of the war? On an income of $2,500 the tax will be $10 a year—83½ cents a month—toward defraying the expenses of the war. Why, Mr. President, if a man has an income of $4,500, under this bill as it is now presented he would only pay a tax of $50 a year.

Then take the case I cited last night, of an individual whose percentage of profits of a corporation earning 10 per cent per annum would be $1,000,000. Under the existing law and the pending bill we impose an excess-profits tax of 52.9 per cent on the profits of the company in which he is interested as a stockholder, and before they can distribute a cent of their profits or a cent of the pro rata of the profits due this individual there is taken from the corporation, of the amount which otherwise would be his, $529,000. That would leave a balance of $471,000, and just as soon as that is distributed he must pay an income tax of 38.4 per cent, or an amount of $179,168.40. In other words, Mr. President, out of the $1,000,000 to which he was entitled he would receive $291,831.60, provided he had no further income to increase the rate of taxation on the income as provided in the different brackets.

I want to take by taxation every dollar that is necessary, not only from corporations but from individuals, and not interfere with the productivity of the industries of our country or with the expansion of business made necessary by the war.

Mr. President, when we take into consideration the prosperity of England and France and all the other foreign countries during the prewar period, and the fact that during that time our business was subnormal, and when we consider the tax upon excess profits provided in this bill, and also the rates of income tax provided for, I think Senators must admit that it is the highest taxation of any country in the world to-day.

We are now considering an income tax. Is there any country in all the world imposing the rate of taxation on incomes that we propose in this measure? Not one. The highest rate of income tax imposed in England is 42½ per cent, and the English law provides rates from 11½ up to 42½ per cent. Besides that, Mr. President, when we take into consideration the exemption allowed by England, the English income-tax law does not approach the rates of taxation imposed under the pending bill.

Canada has no income-tax law; she does not impose one cent of tax on incomes; and her tax upon excess profits, with a greater exemption than provided for in this bill, is far less than ours.

Take France. What are her taxes? Fifty per cent on excess profits and an income tax graduated from 1 per cent to 10 per cent. Under existing law and the rate of taxation imposed by this bill the highest bracket in this bill is 67 per cent. The highest bracket in France is 10 per cent. And yet Senators, for future political use, undertake to say that we are not imposing upon the industries of this country taxes that compare with those imposed by others!

Mr. President, I know there are a large number of amendments yet to be offered to this title before 4 o'clock, and perhaps some Senators would like to discuss them when offered. I am not going to take any more time of the Senate in the discussion of the particular amendment that is now before the Senate. I know that the taxation that we are imposing in this bill is all that we ought to impose on the industries of this country if we expect them to expand as they have done in the past, and if we expect them to meet the demands of our Government and our allies in the war.

Mr. President, England has learned that it is impossible to fix a maximum price upon her products. She has given that up. France and Germany have given it up, and we are thinking of making the mistake they made.

I think, Mr. President, all Senators understand that if we limit the profits of industries it will be impossible to collect the necessary revenue under any reasonable rate of taxation. There is no question about that. I still hope that Congress will take no action that will interfere with the productive activity of the industries of the country. I am fearful that we have reached the point already.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	McKellar	Sherman
Beckham	Husting	McNary	Shields
Brady	James	Myers	Simmons
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smoot
Cuberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kellogg	Page	Swanson
Fernald	Kenyon	Penrose	Trammell
Fletcher	King	Phelan	Vardaman

Frellinghuysen	Knox	Reed	Warren
Gerry	La Follette	Robinson	Watson
Gronna	Lewis	Saulsbury	Williams
Hale	Lodge	Shafroth	Wolcott
Hitchcock	McCumber	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. He is detained from the Chamber on official business. He informed me that he would vote as I would. Therefore I vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the last vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I will make the same transfer I made on the previous vote, transferring my pair for the day with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again transfer my pair as on the previous vote, and I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when Mr. THOMPSON's name was called). I was requested to state that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is absent on official business. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent and if present would vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS]. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I am informed that if present he would vote as I would. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 51—as follows:

YEAS—26.

Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	McKellar	Shafroth
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	McNary	Sheppard
Brady	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Sutherland
Gronna	Kenyon	Norris	Trammell

So Mr. HOLLIS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 8, on page 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after the amendment heretofore agreed to, insert:

That in addition to the tax imposed by subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 1 of the act of September 8, 1916, "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," and by other provisions of this act there shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon that portion of the net income of every individual in excess of $25,000 a tax of 10 per cent upon such income received in the calendar year 1917, and every calendar year thereafter: Provided, That commencing November 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the war with the Imperial German Government and the return to the United States of the Army employed in Europe in the prosecution of said war, every enlisted or drafted man and every commissioned officer whose service during said war is in a foreign country, in addition to the pay allowance of existing law, shall receive an additional pay allowance at the rate of $50 per month so long as he shall be in such service in any foreign country: Provided, however, That this shall not apply to service in the Philippines, Guam, or any possessions of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, let me say of the proposed amendment that it was drafted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and presented tentatively yesterday to the Senate at my request and during my absence. Having returned to the Senate, I think it my duty to offer the amendment as a proposal of my own and address the Senate briefly in support of it.

This proposed amendment would add to the estimated revenue to be collected under the bill the sum of $194,000,000. This is based upon figures as to the amount of taxable income in excess of $25,000. These were furnished in the computation of the estimates of the amounts to be raised under the several income-tax amendments which have been offered. The taxable income in excess of $25,000 amounts to $1,940,000,000, and 10 per cent of that amount would be $194,000,000.

Besides this additional income, the amendment provides additional compensation for the enlisted and drafted men and the commissioned officers of the United States Army while in service in the prosecution of the war in a foreign country. This additional compensation would only apply so long as they are in the service in a foreign country, and would cease automatically when they return to the United States.

Upon the basis of the expectations with respect to the equipment and movement of such troops, I have made a computation as to the amount of money that would be required to pay this additional compensation to the men we are sending across the sea to fight in a foreign country. For the purpose of these computations I have assumed that we may have an army of 600,000 men in France by the end of the present fiscal year. If we do, then this amendment will provide for them a little better compensation than is provided under the present law; if we do not have this number of soldiers abroad, then so much the better, for we will have then additional revenue to meet other pressing demands arising out of the war.

This additional compensation would not begin until November 1. All of the army of 600,000 men and 18,000 officers would not receive this additional compensation for the full eight months from November 1 to the end of the fiscal year. It would begin to run on November 1 as to each man then in France and as to those who go later upon their landing in a foreign country, and would continue as to each only so long as he was employed in this war in a foreign country. In making the computation, allowance is made for the time when this new addition will take effect, but there is no allowance for deductions because of officers or men who may be detached for one cause or another and ordered home. So that the estimate is liberal. In addition to the margin afforded by the excess of revenue provided under the proposed amendment over the estimated amount necessary to make this additional allowance there would be a further substantial deduction because of detachments from service in this war in a foreign country to service at home.

With this explanation of the method of making the computation, the estimate is as follows:

Total taxable income in excess of $25,000	$1,940,000,000
Ten per cent of same will produce a revenue to the amount of	194,000,000
Total amount necessary to pay $50 additional to each enlisted and drafted man and each commissioned officer on the basis of an army of 600,000 soldiers of the line in France by end of fiscal year	155,093,750
Excess	38,906,250

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if, under existing law, the troops abroad are paid more than they are while in this country?

Mr. HARDWICK. My understanding is that they are paid 20 per cent additional. If that is not true, I hope some Senator will correct me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will state, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, that the base pay of a private in the Army is $15 per month. By the act of May 18, 1917, a soldier was given an additional pay of $15 per month. Then, in addition, there is a bonus of 20 per cent of the base pay of $15 per month for foreign service.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This bonus amounts to $3 a month. The total pay of a private in France during the period of his first enlistment is $33.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not care to debate this question at length before the Senate, because the amendment speaks for itself. It is perfectly patent; every man can understand exactly what it means.

As the Senate knows, I have never favored the drafting of men for service outside of this country, beyond the realm. The majority has decreed otherwise; the President has approved the legislation to that effect; so that it is, as far as we can tell, unless the courts should declare to the contrary, the established policy of this country for the conduct of this war, however much some of us may dissent from it or may regret it.

Now, that being true, we must face conditions as they are. That being true, we must ask ourselves, each one of us, this question: Are we willing to conscript the flesh and blood of this country and send it across the seas outside of the Republic and its farthest possessions to face death and danger in a foreign land against a foreign foe, and do we hesitate, having done that, to conscript a little of the wealth of this country to pay them a decent wage, as near as we can afford to pay them a decent wage for the great service that they are expected to render and for the great danger that they must undergo?

A private is getting $33 a month, or will get it in France, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] informs the Senate, and I am sure his information is accurate. If we added $50 more to that pay it would be $83 a month. Does any Senator of the United States think that that is an extravagant compensation for men who, without their consent, are carried outside of the realm to fight the battles of this Republic on a foreign soil?

Ah, Mr. President, they talk to me about an insurance provision. I am willing to make it as liberal as any Senator in this body can suggest; but the wisest, the best, and the most self-respecting of all insurance is to give these men a decent pay, as far as we can possibly afford it; one that will enable them to take care of their families and dependents and obtain some comfort to themselves while they are undergoing these dangers and privations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I understand the provisions of the proposed insurance measure—I have not had the opportunity to study it in detail—it is proposed that whatever fund is created out of which insurance shall be paid shall be taken out of the pay of the soldiers.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly, from the little that we already allow them under existing law. Under that scheme, as it now stands, deduction is to be made for the insurance provision that is made for the benefit of their families by the Government. I hope that, regardless of the fate of this amendment, the Senate will change that provision and alter that part of the program when that measure reaches this body.

But after we have drafted our sons and the sons of our neighbors to send them into this service, what Senator can afford to hesitate in giving them this small additional compensation? Can the men in possession of incomes of $25,000 per year or more, who have with almost solid front favored this war, supported it and urged it, be heard to say that out of their munificence, out of their plenty, and out of their wealth they are unwilling to make this small contribution to pay somewhat more liberally the conscripted soldiers for this war that they have favored?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has in his amendment, has he not, two distinct propositions? Is the 10 per cent increase the Senator provides in any way connected with the additional amount to be paid to the soldiers?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, not necessarily; although, frankly, in putting on the 10 per cent on these incomes above $25,000 the primary purpose is to pay this extra amount.

Mr. KENYON. Will it do it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I gave the figures. It would require for an army of 600,000 drafted men and the officers who go with it, and the staff and different auxiliary services, $155,093,750 to make this addition to their pay. The amendment would raise $194,000,000. So the amendment would raise nearly $39,000,000 more than would be required to give this additional pay.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not modify his amendment. He says that 10 per cent was put in for the purpose of paying this expense. Will he not provide in the amendment itself that that shall be its purpose and have it specifically set aside for that purpose?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that would be a very good suggestion. I have no objection to it, although we can not calculate it that way. If that is done the provision will have to be made that the excess, if any, shall go into the general fund of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will prepare an amendment embodying his suggestion I am perfectly willing to accept it, because that is what I meant, and I am willing to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to say that the cost would be only $150,000,000?

Mr. HARDWICK. One hundred and fifty-five million dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. That is figured on the basis of the balance of the year.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; from November 1.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. HARDWICK. To the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. Until June 30 next?

Mr. HARDWICK. Until June 30 next.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator knows it is the intention of the Government to send more than 600,000 troops abroad.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then we ought to pay them, also.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not discussing that question. I am saying what the intention is.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course we can only provide up to the end of the fiscal year for the forces that we can reasonably anticipate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know that it is exactly proper to state in the open Senate, but I will say that generally, in the absence of the Senator from Georgia, I had at his request the responsibility of making some computations upon this matter placed upon me.

I will say that the amendment as drawn will provide for the troops that will be on foreign soil at the end of the fiscal year. I state that with a certainty.

Mr. HARDWICK. The amendment has been carefully prepared, as I understand the Senator, and, as he has stated, with those things in view and is measured to fit the situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know it is based upon 600,000 troops, and I feel warranted in saying that those are all the troops which it is expected—if the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] insists upon a more definite answer—will be in France at that time or on foreign soil at that time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If this amendment is adopted, and it is discovered during the winter that sufficient funds have not been provided, it would be very easy for the Congress to supply the deficiency.

Mr. HARDWICK. It would be very easy, indeed. If the spirit animating the Senate is such that this amendment can prevail—as I hope it may—we shall have no trouble in requiring the wealth and the resources of this country to furnish to these men what we regard as the most reasonable compensation we can possibly allow them. I think it ought to be done. These men are to go far away from home—thousands of miles away from home—to face conditions and expenses and situations that they know little of and as to which we are not well advised. I would rather see them liberally paid under all the circumstances than to do any other one thing I can think of connected with the troops in this war. I hope that the Senate, which has not hesitated to pass a law requiring the service of these young men, will not hesitate to give them this somewhat meager salary, which is, however, considerably larger than what they get under existing law.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, so far in the debate on this bill I have not taken up any of the time of the Senate, but this amendment is of such a character that I can not sit silent in my seat. The American soldier is not of such a mercenary disposition as this amendment would seem to imply. The war is being carried on in Europe, and we hope to keep the enemy from our borders. Our soldiers, by the act which we passed last Congress, receive $30 a month, and are better paid than are any other soldiers in the world except the soldiers of Canada. It is belittling, it is humiliating, to the American soldier to intimate to him that he will not go across the water to fight for his country unless he is paid $50 a month extra.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. NELSON. When the Civil War broke out the soldiers of the Union never thought of such a thing as inquiring what their pay was to be. The first two months of my service I received only $11 a month, which was the pay of the private in the old Regular Army. It was afterwards increased to $13 a month, and finally to $16 a month. At that time, however, gold was at a premium of $2.40. The question of dollars and cents never cut any figure except among bounty jumpers.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. What does the Senator from Georgia want?

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NELSON. Well, "Ask and you shall receive." [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator. If the Senator from Minnesota entertains those views, why does he not propose to repeal the provision of law granting 20 per cent bounty to soldiers on foreign service in the present war? Why does he not propose to reduce the pay of the American soldier to this other standard of which he speaks?

Mr. NELSON. In the first place, the law giving extra pay to our soldiers in foreign service has been long on the statute books.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it is belittling to them, according to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Now, hold on; wait for the answer. That law was enacted because we sent troops over to the Philippine Islands, to another hemisphere, to a far distant part of the world, where the climatic conditions were different, and to reach which a journey of almost three months was required. So we increased their pay by 20 per cent. Then we applied the increase to soldiers serving in distant Alaska, in Mexico, and in Panama. Now it is necessary for our soldiers to go to Europe; we do not want to fight the enemy here. Is the Senator from Georgia anxious to have the enemy invade our country so that our soldiers can fight down in Georgia—

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator let me answer?

Mr. NELSON. If it were not because I wished my country better than that, I should like to have some of the German soldiers invade the State of Georgia, and then I should like to see the Senator from Georgia meet them at the head of a battalion of colored troops. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No manifestation of approval or disapproval is permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NELSON. I yield, of course.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator is not willing to yield, I shall not ask him to do so.

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the Senator from Georgia has not the slightest fear that he will ever see German troops either in Minnesota or in Georgia, or anywhere else in this country.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Georgia need not mix Minnesota up in it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the Senator from Minnesota need not mix Georgia, or any colored troops, or any such other meanness as that in it, either.

Mr. NELSON. Minnesota is imbued with no such spirit as seems to animate some other sections of the country. I feel that I am speaking on behalf of the American soldier who goes to meet the enemy abroad when I say I do not want this discriminatory legislation—this humiliating, belittling legislation—to be passed. I do not want it to be said to our brave boys—and they are brave boys, whether they volunteer or are drafted or belong to the Regular Army—"If you boys will advance to the red line of battle on the fields of France we will give you $50 a month extra."

To make this pilgarlic look plausible on the stump, it is proposed to cover it with an extra tax, to tax a certain class of capitalists, in order that our soldiers may be given $50 a month extra. If I were a young man and were in the Army of the United States, either as a volunteer or as a drafted man, I would spurn such legislation; I would look upon it with contempt.

There is such a thing in this world—and it is nowhere more in evidence than amongst the young men of the United States—as patriotism and love of country. They are not inspired by any such mercenary motive as is implied in this amendment. They are not continually instigating legislation to make this war unpopular or to hamstring the Government. They are not as chicken-hearted as are some statesmen of whom I know. Our boys have entered all branches of the service; some are in the Regular Army, some in the National Guard, some in the National Army, and some in the Marine Corps. The State University of Minnesota from among its students has sent over a hundred young men as volunteers in the United States Marine Corps. They are down at Quantico. Those brave boys marched in review the other day. They were not clamoring for $50 a month extra, though they are going over to Europe.

Oh, this demand comes from another source and arises because of an inspiration that does not flow from the men in the ranks. Nobody is fooled by any such thing. Neither the American people nor the American soldier can be fooled by any such legislation as this. Our soldiers, whether they are drafted or whether they enter the service as volunteers, are patriotic American citizens, ready to do their duty and to do it faithfully, bravely, and well. You need not give them a bonus in order to make them fully do their duty. They are content to serve without any special bonus or any special inducement; but the very fact that this amendment granting a bonus of $50 a month to our soldiers is coupled with a proposal to conscript, as it is called, the wealth of certain capitalists, shows the inspiration and the motive at the bottom of the amendment so clearly that no man who can read need make any mistake about it. The amendment is begotten of the desire to show the people what enemies you are of capital and how anxious you are to get after the rich.

Senators talk about conscripting our men. Is not our draft law a fair law? Does it not reach the rich as well as the poor; the high as well as the low? Is there any exemption in the draft law which says that poor men, men of moderate circumstances only, shall serve and that none of the rich shall serve? The law is general; it affects all alike within the age limit, the rich and the poor, the high and the low.

What is most galling in this amendment is that it implies that the American soldier who goes abroad to fight the battles of his country is a mercenary being, and that he will not carry the banner and flag of the United States against the enemy unless he receives an extra bonus of $50 a month, which is to be squeezed out of some capitalists.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I assume, of course, that the purpose of the amendment is to pay the enlisted and noncommissioned personnel of the Army a sum which would adequately compensate them for the services rendered.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that it applies also to officers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It applies also to officers, so the Senator from Georgia says. Therefore the assumption is fairly made that neither the officers nor the men of the Army receive a compensation adequate for the service which they perform.

Mr. President, the Senate will remember the long discussion which was had here when the proposition was first made to increase the pay of the noncommissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army. An increase was finally agreed upon by the House and Senate, and I call the attention of the Senate to the act of May 18, 1917, section 10 of which provides:

SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of the continuous-service pay.

Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Georgia is based upon a round base pay of $30 per month, whereas, as a matter of fact—

Mr. WARREN. Fifty dollars a month under the proposed amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The proposed increase adds $50 a month to the base pay which the soldiers are now getting; but his statement of the pay now received by them is based upon the assumption that they all get around $30 per month.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the rule which requires the Senators to rise and address the Chair before interrupting.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that Senators address the Chair, so that other Senators may hear them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please observe the rule.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have no objection to any interruption. As I was saying, all soldiers do not get $30 as their base pay. The average pay of the enlisted personnel, which includes the noncommissioned grades of the Army, is very much larger. If the amount that is now provided by this amendment is allowed to the soldier, and we add $50 to the pay which he now gets, in some instances enlisted men and noncommissioned officers will get far in excess of what any of them could receive in private employment in this country, not taking into consideration the clothing and the upkeep of the men themselves.

Mr. President, in order to show what the men in the Army get, I am going to call the attention of the Senate to the pay which they do receive. In the noncommissioned officer grades of the Army the pay of a quartermaster sergeant, senior grade, of the Quartermaster Corps, on first enlistment is $75 per month; on second enlistment, $79 per month; third enlistment, $83 per month; fourth enlistment, $87 per month; fifth enlistment, $91 a month; sixth enlistment, $95 a month; and on his seventh enlistment, $99 per month. That was the amount he received prior to the act of May 18, 1917. When that act was passed the class of noncommissioned officers to which I now call attention had their base pay on first enlistment increased by $6 per month. That does not include the upkeep and maintenance of the soldier that is furnished to him in addition to his pay. So that, if you include his upkeep and include clothing furnished him, he receives very much more than $81 per month for the first enlistment—very much greater compensation than most men are receiving in civil life.

The pay to which I have called attention applies to the band leader of the Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers; to master electricians of the Signal Corps; to master electricians of the Coast Artillery; to master engineers, senior grade, Corps of Engineers, and to master hospital sergeants, medical department. So that their salaries, by repeated enlistments, run up to $100 per month.

In the next grade, Mr. President, the hospital sergeant in the medical department receives $65 per month on his first enlistment, and repeated enlistments bring that up to $89 per month. The pay of that grade was increased $6 by the act of May 18, 1917. The master engineer, junior grade, Corps of Engineers, gets $65 per month, which may be increased in the same proportion, and $6 is added to that by the act of May 18, 1917. An engineer of the Coast Artillery Corps gets $50 per month and an increase of $6 by the act referred to. Mr. President, I am not going to read all of these figures, but I ask to have them inserted in the RECORD, so that the Senate and the country may understand just what pay the enlisted personnel of the Army get. The amounts paid them are in excess of the amounts paid any army in the world, and exceed those paid to the highest commissioned officers in many of the most efficient armies.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator including the 20 per cent extra for foreign service?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I am only speaking now of the base pay prior to the passage of the act of May 18, 1917, and the increases made by that act.

Mr. WARREN. I think it would be well for the Senator to state as well the fact that the soldier need buy practically nothing except his tobacco, for everything else, including medical attention, is furnished him. I think it would be well also for the Senator to state that he gets 20 per cent additional while on foreign service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I repeat, I am only giving now the pay of these men prior to the passage of the act of May 18, 1917; but there should be added to it the amount of increase provided in the act of May 18, 1917. That does not include the extra pay of 20 per cent of the base pay for foreign service.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I understood the Senator—perhaps I was mistaken—to say that the increase which was made later applies to the soldier wherever he may be, but that the 20 per cent only applies in case he serves in a foreign country. Am I correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is correct; he only gets the 20 per cent increase on the base pay when he goes into foreign service, whether in Europe, Alaska, or the Philippine Islands. The amounts which I have given apply to service in the United States, but if he goes into foreign service 20 per cent is added to his base pay; in other words, a man who gets $75 per month now receives an addition of 20 per cent to his pay, which makes $90 a month; and adding $6, which is provided in the act of May 18, 1917, he would get $96 per month. So it is with the pay of all these men. I ask to have the table to which I have referred inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator to give the pay of the private soldier. He has given the pay of a noncommissioned officer. I should like to know what the private soldier gets.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The private soldier prior to the act of May 18, 1917, got $15 per month on his first enlistment; on his second enlistment, $18; third enlistment, $21; fourth enlistment, $22; fifth enlistment, $23; sixth enlistment, $24; and on his seventh enlistment, $25. To the $15 base pay of the private soldier $15 was added by the act of May 18, 1917, making $30 per month as the base pay, and if he goes into foreign service he gets 20 per cent increase on the original base pay, making $33 per month on first enlistment. These payments, of course, do not include his maintenance, clothing, hospital fees, and his care during illness, while in the service. These ought all to be taken into consideration in arriving at a proper conclusion as to what the private soldier receives.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The men who are going into this war, however, are all first-term enlisted men, and by their enlistment are held to be first-term enlisted men for the duration of the war.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true of the men who are to go into the National Army.

Mr. HARDWICK. Therefore there is no need of the Senator reading the other figures, for they do not throw additional light on the question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, Mr. President, the conclusion that the Senate is apt to draw from the statement of the Senator from Georgia is that the enlisted personnel of the Army gets $15 per month plus the $15 increase by the act of May 18, 1917, which is not the fact, and I have simply stated the facts in order that the Senate—

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not desire to misrepresent me, I am sure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May see that the enlisted men of the Army, even the privates, are treated better than many people in private employ in this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator, of course, does not desire to misrepresent me. I said the private receives $30 per month, as the Senator knows if he heard my remarks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I mean $30 per month.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is different.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that is not all that the men in the Army get. By the act of May 12, 1917, extra pay is allowed to these men, as follows:

That hereafter enlisted men now qualified or hereafter qualifying as marksmen shall receive $2 per month; as sharpshooters, $3 per month; as expert riflemen, $5 per month; as second-class gunners, $2 per month; as first-class gunners, $3 per month; as expert first-class gunners, $5 per month; as gun pointers, gun commanders, observers second-class, chief planters, and chief loaders, $7 per month; as plotters, observers first-class, casemate electricians, and coxswains, $9 per month, all in addition to their pay, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, but no man shall receive at the same time additional pay for more than one of the classifications named in this section.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator might add to those extra payments the $2 a month which is allowed to every soldier who receives a certificate of merit. A soldier may have two such certificates in which event he gets $2 on each; so that those men who have received special commendation for their qualifications and obtain certificates of merit get $2 or $4 per month in addition to other extra forms of compensation allowed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true as the Senator states.

Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to make a mercenary army in the strictest sense of the word. So far as the Army of the United States is concerned, as I have stated, it gets a larger pay now than any army in the world. I know in all the history of the world of but one mercenary army, Mr. President, and the stigma that attached to them clings to them to-day. I refer to the Hessian Army that came to the American Colonies to fight in a foreign service. They are distinguished to-day from the men who fought on the British side in the American Revolution because of purely patriotic motives. Our men who are now fighting because they feel that it is a duty incumbent upon them as American citizens to go abroad and fight the battles of their country will deserve distinction and will receive distinction, Mr. President, if they go as they are going now, rather than if they go to France as the Hessian Army came to this country to serve for pay and not from the purest motives of patriotism.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator a question for information. During the time of the discussion of the Army bill, and when all of these allowances and forms of compensation were being discussed was there any such proposition made?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. None at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Was there any bill introduced to pay $50 a month to our troops in foreign service?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In addition to the $30 per month?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. None that I recall.

Mr. McCUMBER. How does it happen that when we begin to consider a revenue bill the question is brought up for the first time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator can draw his own conclusions about that, and has already had something to say upon the general subject, which I think was quite pertinent.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the Senator if he did not feel that he was Hessianizing the Army and belittling our soldiers when he voted to double their pay in 1917? If the argument of the Senator is sound now, why would not the same argument have been sound at that time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I opposed that increase as I oppose the present proposal. Whether they are doing so intentionally or not I am not prepared to say, but if the insistence the distinguished Senator from Georgia has made here from time to time, and which he is now making, Mr. President, becomes the law in this land, the United States might just as well lay down in this fight and go before the world as a nation of cravens and cowards. For my part, I am not willing to assent to any such proposition as that. I do not mean to charge that this amendment is offered for political or for any other purposes than those which are patriotic from the viewpoint of the Senator from Georgia and that of the Senator from Mississippi; but I do know this, and everybody who has paid any attention to the conditions of the time knows it, that if we abandon the system of the selective draft now in vogue and adopt a resolution which was introduced by the Senator from Georgia some days ago the United States will not have any Army with which to fight this war. If we are not permitted to send troops from the United States to the Continent of Europe, as has been insisted by the Senator from Georgia, we will not have any Army, either here or elsewhere, and if we adopt the other insistence which the Senator from Georgia has made, that a man can absolutely get out of the service of the National Government by simply joining the National Guard, we will have no Army at all. I for one say that this war is being fought not entirely that democracy may be made safe the world over, but it is fought to preserve the very liberties of our own people here and elsewhere and to preserve the institutions which have come down to us from the fathers of this Republic.

I can hear distinguished gentlemen of the "holier than thou" type on the stump in the next campaign saying, as they have said here, of those of us who believe in maintaining the dignity and honor of our country and the rights of American citizens on land and sea, "You are willing to conscript the souls and bodies of our young men, but you are not willing to conscript wealth."

Mr. President, we are conscripting wealth up to the very danger point, for it must not be forgotten that the business interests of this country must continue to be measurably protected in order that the sinews of war may be furnished to take care of the young men who compose our Army and Navy and who go abroad to fight, and in order to furnish them with the things that are necessary for their protection and support. Destroy our business life and you destroy our armies and navies.

It is so easy, Mr. President, to talk about conscripting the souls and bodies of the young men and refusing to conscript wealth when we are doing both. I have no doubt but that when the time comes the Congress of the United States will tax the wealth of the country to its utmost extent, and, if necessary, take everything even to the last farthing in order to fight this war to a successful conclusion. But why do this in the first six months of the war, and before it is convenient or necessary? Why this agitation unless it be for political purposes or to prejudice the country against the war or its prosecution?

Mr. President, I can not resist the temptation here and now to hear read into the Record the resolutions adopted on the 6th of September by the American Alliance for Labor and Democracy at their meeting at Minneapolis, Minn., showing their views about the war. They breathe the spirit of patriotism, and I commend them to those who would cripple America in this emergency. There was nothing said there about conscripting human bodies and human souls to fight this war.

There was not anything in those resolutions, or any of them, about increasing the pay of the men who were going to fight the battles of their country; there was nothing sordid or disloyal in them; on the contrary every word and every line of those resolutions breathes the spirit of splendid patriotism, and expresses a determination to assist the President of the United States in carrying this war to a successful conclusion.

How different the expressions of this splendid organization from the expressions of the so-called People's Council for Peace and against militarism which undertook to meet in the same place a few days ago. There, Mr. President, if we are to judge from the traitorous and seditious expressions of individual members, there was to be a meeting which was to denounce the selective-draft law and advise against obedience to it. There was to be a meeting which was to denounce militarism and to clamor for peace, even if a dishonorable peace. There was to be a meeting which was to cripple the good right arm of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and to hamper and handicap and hamstring this Government in its purpose to carry this war to a successful conclusion. If not financed by Germany, if not composed of Germans, its purposes were surely in the interest of the enemies of America. They were treasonable and those who attended were traitors to their country. But, acting under a law that has been recently passed to prevent such overt acts of treason as were proposed, the meeting was not permitted to be held by either National, State, or local authorities; and God grant that the Congress of the United States and State authorities as well will sustain and maintain every department of the Government that endeavors to prevent or suppress these seditious and treacherous meetings wherever sought to be held while our country is at war and our young men who are in the service fighting to protect our citizens against the outrageous and barbarous cruelties of the Hun.

I am going to ask to have the resolutions to which I have referred printed in the Record.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let them be read, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask, then, Mr. President, that the Secretary read them. I think it is a pretty good time to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolutions. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read them.

The Secretary read as follows:

The resolution on war aims declares:

"The so-called People's Council and other organizations allied with it, professing to speak in the name of the working people of America, have declared that the aims and purposes for which we are at war have not been definitely stated. These people have made a great deal of clamor, demanding that the President of the United States make a definite statement of the reasons why we are at war and the ends we seek to attain.

"We, the members of the Minneapolis conference of the American Alliance for Labor and Democracy, declare that this demand of the People's Council and other pacifist organizations, even if made in good faith, is entirely unwarranted. The record shows that the aims and purposes of this Nation have been stated with singular lucidity and precision by the President of the United States on various occasions. In support of this statement, we submit the following:

POINTS TO PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

"On January 22, 1917, before the United States entered the war, President Wilson, in an address to the Senate, set forth the principles which should govern any peace with which the United States could associate itself, and be true to its noblest ideals and traditions. These principles of 'a peace worth guaranteeing' are as follows:

- "1. Equality of rights as between nations. (Not to be based on old balance of power.)
- "2. Recognition of the principle that governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed.
- "3. The right of all great peoples to a direct outlet to the sea, by territorial readjustments or neutralizations.
- "4. The freedom of the seas in practically all circumstances.
- "5. The limitations of armaments on land and sea.
- "6. No nation to attempt to extend its polity over any other nation or people.
- "7. A concert of nations to guarantee peace and the rights of all nations. A world organized for peace, not for war. No entangling alliances creating a competition for power, but a concert for peace.

HAS STATED AMERICAN AIM.

"Since the United States entered the war the President has upon three notable occasions, clearly and explicitly set forth the American aim, the objects which must be attained by any peace to which the United States can agree. We refer especially to the war message of April 2, 1917, the note to Russia on May 26, and the reply to his holiness, the Pope, dated August 27, 1917. The war objects stated by the President in these historic documents were as follows:

- "1. Recognition of the rights and liberties of small nations.
- "2. Recognition of the principle that government derives its just power from the consent of the governed.
- "3. Reparations for wrongs done and the erection of adequate safeguards to prevent their being committed again.

"4. No indemnities except as payment for manifest wrongs.
 "5. No people to be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live.
 "6. No territory to change hands except for the purpose of securing those who inhabit it a fair chance of life and liberty.
 "7. No readjustments of power except such as will tend to secure the future peace of the world and the future welfare and happiness of its peoples.
 "8. A genuine and practical cooperation of the free peoples of the world in some common covenant that will combine their forces to secure peace and justice in the dealings of nations with one another.

GAVE WARNING OF DANGER.

"In his Russian note and again in his address at Washington on June 14, President Wilson gave a solemn warning against the sort of peace desired by the German military power—a peace which would not only defeat the objects of the United States in entering the war, but would place this Nation in grave danger of future aggression from Germany.

"He pointed out that the military masters of Germany planned to throw a broad belt of military power across the very center of Europe and beyond the Mediterranean into the heart of Asia. This purpose has been nearly fulfilled through the subjection to German uses of Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey and through the conquest of Serbia and Roumania.

"The only chance left to the masters of Germany of retaining the advantages thus gained and of perpetuating their own domination over the German people is the enactment of an immediate peace upon terms favorable to themselves. Should they succeed in this their prestige and political power will be secure. America itself will be menaced, and this Nation and all the rest of the world will be compelled to remain armed to the teeth to make ready for the next assault by the German military power.

SEEKS NO MATERIAL GAIN.

"In his note to the revolutionary Government of Russia, May 26, 1917, President Wilson justly said that:

"The position of America in this war is so clearly avowed that no man can be excused for mistaking it. She seeks no material profit nor aggrandizement of any kind. She is fighting for no advantage or selfish object of her own, but for the liberations of peoples everywhere from the aggressions of autocratic force."

"We, the men and women of the trade-union, the socialist movements of America, organized into the American Alliance for Labor and Democracy, in submitting this record to our fellow citizens, assert that in all history no Government has ever stated its aims on entering a war or while such a war was being fought with anything approaching the definiteness, clarity, and candor revealed by these utterances. We assert, moreover, that in all essential particulars the aims thus set forth are entirely consistent with the great ideals of democracy and internationalism for which the American labor movement has always stood and which are fundamental to its being.

"We rejoice at the fact that we are thus solemnly committed to the principle of the complete autonomy and independence of nations. Only upon the basis of this generous nationalism can anything like a great and worthy internationalism be established.

NO PEACE WITH HOHENZOLLERNS.

"We rejoice, too, that this Nation is thus solemnly pledged not only to refrain from attempting to extend its own dominion over any other nation or people, but to use its great influence to the end that no nation shall attempt to extend its polity over any other nation or people."

"We approve unreservedly the distinction drawn by the President between the German people and their Government and we believe that by insisting that peace can not be made with the Hohenzollern dynasty but only with a democratized Germany, the President of the United States has, as befits his great station, rendered noble service to the cause of international democracy.

"We affirm, then, that the aims and purposes of this Nation have been stated with sufficient clearness and definiteness to satisfy every honest mind, and that it is our profound conviction that the purposes for which we are to serve and sacrifice are the great purposes of international democracy."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that convention was attended not only by distinguished labor leaders and laboring men but by distinguished Socialists and individual members of other great organizations. The head of the American Federation of Labor, who during all of this world-wide struggle has occupied a most patriotic position, attended the convention and delivered an address there, and it may not be inappropriate in this connection to ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning on "Loyalty of labor," as bearing upon the attitude of these distinguished men.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Under the unanimous-consent agreement we are to vote on the income-tax title at 4 o'clock. I inquire whether amendments tendered after 4 o'clock may be properly received and voted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so construes the unanimous-consent agreement. Without objection, the leave requested by the Senator from Oregon will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LOYALTY OF LABOR.

In his stirring address at Minneapolis on Wednesday, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, pledged the united support of organized labor to the Government in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. Gompers touched upon a most important point when in the course of his speech he referred to a certain character of agitation for peace. He said:

"To ask the Government of the United States now to state specifically the terms of peace is to play, consciously or unconsciously, into the hands of the enemy."

It may not have been considered necessary for Mr. Gompers or any other to pledge labor to loyalty. It is of the highest encouragement, nevertheless, to know that such a meeting as that held at Minneapolis was thoroughly committed to the cause of patriotism, and that the expression of its sentiments and convictions should have gone beyond the mere fact of patriotic intent to the recognition of subtle forces now at work on the labor element and of the real purpose that lies behind these pacifist agitations.

The presence of John Spargo and others who were formerly prominent in the ranks of the Socialists indicates how widely recognized has become the sinister purpose that underlies the peace propaganda. These men have had their eyes opened, with the result that they promptly dissociated themselves from a movement which has everywhere come under the domination of the German Government, engineered by German agents, and financed by German capital. If any doubts were previously held they have now been dissipated by the character of socialist data seized by the Department of Justice. Although the I. W. W. activities have been found largely in the hands of Austrians, they, too, are the tools of Germany, to be exploited and then cast aside, just as will be the fate of the German Socialists, who are despised by the German militarists and are merely being used.

In free America the divisions into classes is very vague at best. There is scarcely a great industrial leader in the Nation to-day who has not worked his way up from the ranks of labor. Mr. Gompers and his associates have given clear warning against enemy efforts toward class dissensions in the face of a national danger.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of this same subject, a letter addressed by the President of the United States to Mr. Samuel Gompers, chairman, explaining why he could not attend the meeting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The President has sent the following letter to Mr. Samuel Gompers, chairman of the American Alliance for Labor and Democracy:

AUGUST 31, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. GOMPERS: I am sure that you understand that my inability to accept the invitation to address the Minneapolis conference of the American Alliance for Labor and Democracy is due only to official necessity, and not in any degree to lack of appreciation of the importance of the occasion. The cause you and your fellow patriots uphold is one with the cause we are defending with arms. While our soldiers and sailors are doing their manful work to hold back reaction in its most brutal and aggressive form, we must oppose at home the organized and individual efforts of those dangerous elements who hide disloyalty behind a screen of specious and evasive phrases.

I have read with real pride the names of the men and women who are to take part in the Minneapolis conference. Not one but has a record of devoted service to fundamental democracy; not one but has fought the long, hard fight for equal justice, braving every bitterness that the humblest life might know a larger measure of happiness.

NOT BETRAYAL OF PRINCIPLE.

With all my heart I want them to feel that their devotion to country is in no wise a betrayal of principle, and that in serving America to-day they are serving their cause no less faithfully than in the past. I myself have had sympathy with the fears of the workers of the United States; for the tendency of war is toward reaction, and too often military necessities have been made an excuse for the destruction of laboriously erected industrial and social standards. These fears, happily, have proved to be baseless. With quickened sympathies and appreciation, with a new sense of the invasive and insidious dangers of oppression, our people have not only held every inch of ground that has been won by years of struggle but have added to the gains of the twentieth century along every line of human betterment. Questions of wages and hours of labor and industrial readjustment have found a solution which gives to the toiler a new dignity and a new sense of social and economic security. I beg you to feel that my support has not been lacking and that the Government has not failed at any point in granting every just request advanced by you and your associates in the name of the American worker.

BATTLE LINE OF DEMOCRACY.

No one who is not blind can fail to see that the battle line of democracy for America stretches to-day from the fields of Flanders to every house and workshop where toiling, upward-striving men and women are counting the treasures of right and justice and liberty which are being threatened by our present enemies.

It has not been a matter of surprise to me that the leaders in certain groups have sought to ignore our grievances against the men who have equally mistreated the German people. Their insistence that a Nation whose rights have been grossly violated, whose citizens have been foully murdered under their own flag, whose neighbors have been invited to join in making conquest of its territory, whose patience in pressing the claims of justice and humanity has been met with the most shameful policy of truculence and treachery, their insistence that a Nation so outraged does not know its own mind, that it has no comprehensible reason for defending itself or for joining with all its might in maintaining a free future for itself and its ideals, is all a piece with their deafness to the oft-repeated statement of our national purposes.

EQUAL JUSTICE MUST RULE.

Is it, perhaps, that these forces of antagonism have not yet learned to know the voice of that America we love and serve. It may well be that those among us who stand ready to forward the plans of aggression bred in secret do not understand the language of democracy when it proclaims the purposes of war in terms of a peace for the peoples that shall be untroubled by those to whom men are but the pawns in their struggle for power and gain. But true Americans—those who toll here for home and the hope of better things, whose lifted eyes have caught the vision of a liberated world, have said that of the policy of blood and iron there shall be an end, and that equal justice, which is the heart of democracy, shall rule in its stead.

May not those who toll and those who have made common cause of the larger hope for the masses of mankind take renewed heart as they think on those days when America has taken its stand for the rights of humanity and the fellowship of social and international justice?

Sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,

President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How true it is, Mr. President, that leaders of certain groups in and out of Congress "have sought to ignore our grievances against the men who have equally misled the German people." There has been no clearer statement made of the grievances of America, of the issues involved in this war, and of our country's attitude than is embodied in the resolutions adopted at the Minneapolis convention and in the letter of the President expressing regret at his inability to be there as one of the participants in the discussions which took place.

Mr. President, I said awhile ago that if the course that has been mapped out and suggested by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is to be followed, we will not have any Army in this country; we can not, therefore, prosecute the war. We will be compelled to sue for a dishonorable peace. The Senator has always expressed his opposition to conscription, which was perfectly proper before the law was enacted; but the Senator, not satisfied to assent to the will of the Congress as expressed in the so-called selective-draft act, has sought to modify, or rather to destroy, it by amendment so as not to require the service of anyone taken under the selective draft outside of the territorial limits of the United States without his consent. That bill was referred to the Military Affairs Committee, Mr. President, and by a unanimous vote of the committee I was instructed to report it back unfavorably to this body.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss again—because we have been over it a number of times—this whole question of the selective draft; but, Mr. President, it is absolutely the only fair way to raise an army, and I sometimes regret that any of our young men volunteered in the Regular Army or in any other branch of the service after its enactment, for the reason that the selective draft would have operated with perfect uniformity all over this country, and instead of having communities now where the supply of labor has been depleted because men have so generally volunteered and gone into the service the Army would have been filled by men selected here and there in every community, and no interruptions would have followed either in agricultural, commercial, or industrial life.

But, Mr. President, that law is on the statute books now, and why agitate here and elsewhere the question as to whether it was wise or unwise? Why disturb the Army that has been organized under it and under a volunteer system just as we are entering upon a war with the most efficient military system in the world? Why undertake to increase the pay of the Army as the pending amendment proposes to do when no dissatisfaction has been expressed anywhere at conditions as they exist? They expected to receive as pay only what the law provides to-day, and the only effect of this proposition of the Senator is to demoralize the Army that is now being organized, make the young men who have been selected to serve in the Army dissatisfied with their condition, and encourage those who are yet to be called to the colors to resist the draft when it becomes necessary to enforce it again.

One peculiar thing about this whole situation is this: It will be found upon investigation that men have resisted the draft only in those parts of the country where their Senators or Representatives have before and since the law was enacted opposed or criticized it in Congress. Without a single exception, as I now remember, it has been opposed only in those cases where either the Senators or the Representatives have opposed the enactment of this law, which acts with such perfect uniformity and fairness all over the country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], I am rejoiced to know, is in opposition to many distinguished men of his State on this great question. Only a few days ago Judge Speer, of Georgia, notwithstanding the views of the Senator from Georgia to the contrary, rendered a decision upholding the constitutionality of the selective-draft law under which the young men are patriotically going into the service, domestic or foreign, without asking any questions as to pay, present or future. I want to read a few lines of that decision, particularly as to the power under the Constitution to authorize the sending of our armies beyond the seas. It is a complete answer to the arguments made by opponents of the present war and by pacifists generally on this subject.

Judge Speer said:

There remains to be considered the contention that Congress can not employ the National Army to be created by virtue of this legislation in foreign lands or beyond the seas. If this is true, then indeed is our country impotent. Then must its people indeed suffer in their own homes, in their cities, and on their farms all the horrors of invasive war. Its military leaders must ignore the settled principle of their science, that the best defensive is the most vigorous offensive. The keen swords of its sons, instead of flashing over the guard of the enemy and piercing his vitals, must be held immovable, as if on an anvil, to be shattered by the reiterated blows of his hammer. Deprived of our aid in the field, successive defeats will visit and crush our allies. Their lands conquered, their navies taken, we must then in turn, solitary and alone, meet on our soil the impact of victorious and barbarous legions whose laws do not forbid their service abroad but which inspire their fierce and veteran armies to deeds of conquest in every clime.

Was this contention maintainable, the misguided men who for their personal ease advance it might all too late discover their fatal error. They would discover it in the flaming homesteads, in the devastated fields, in murdered brethren, in outraged wives and daughters, in their lands, their factories, their merchandise, their stock, their all, coolly appropriated by the conqueror as his own; their institutions destroyed; homeless, landless, and beggars to spend whatever interval of degraded life remains to them in abject slavery to the conqueror.

But our organic law does not so shackle the gigantic energies of the great Republic. After the enumeration of the powers of Congress, among them is, as we have seen, "the power to raise and support armies." In clause 18 of Article I, section 8, it provides the power to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested in this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." Here is the greatest reservoir of power to save the national existence.

It is said that there is no express power to send armies beyond the sea. True; but there is no express power to enact the criminal laws of the United States, none to convey the public domain, to build a trans-continental railroad, nor to construct the Isthmian Canal, nor to create the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor to declare the Monroe doctrine, nor to make the Louisiana Purchase, nor to buy Alaska, nor to take over Porto Rico and the Philippines. This has all been done under the great power to promote the general welfare, just as the selective army will be created under the law here assailed, "to provide for the common defense," and beyond and above all is the inherent power of every nation, however organized, to utilize its every man and its every energy to defend its liberty and to defeat the migration to its soil of mighty nations of ferocious warriors, whose barbarous inhumanity for three years has surpassed all others since the death of Attila, the scourge of God.

I commend this, Mr. President, to the earnest consideration of the Senator, and to those in and out of Congress who are in accord with his views.

Mr. President, it might be said that it is far afield of a discussion of an amendment to a revenue bill to read into the RECORD a decision of a learned Georgia judge on the selective-draft law; but, Mr. President, it has been insisted in the discussion of that very amendment practically that not only is the law unconstitutional but that there is no cause for war and no danger of any invasion upon the part of Germany.

Mr. President, I hope that the latter statement is true. I hope that our beloved land may never be invaded by Germany or any other country; but we do know that before America entered upon this war the German chancellor had sent a proposition to the representative of Germany in Mexico, proposing to divide up the southwestern part of the United States between Mexico and Japan. Could this have been accomplished without invasion? We do know that; and these same gentlemen who are now questioning all the purposes of the administration in the prosecution of this war denied that that message had any existence in fact, but vociferously asserted that the suggestion of it was conjured up by some fertile brain in order to frighten our people and to induce them to stand for what they were pleased to call an unjust war. But, Mr. President, not only was that message produced and established to the satisfaction of the American people, but when the German chancellor found that this had been done he confessed that he had written it. Nor is that the only time when Germany has sought to injure America, if we are to pay any attention at all to what a former American ambassador to Germany had to say upon the subject a short while ago, for not only did Germany negotiate with Mexico for the division of our southwestern area, but she undertook to form a combination with one of our present allies, Great Britain, under the terms of which the Monroe doctrine was to be ignored and America driven to abandon it, and Germany and her allies—if she could have made such allies under such terms—would have had a free hand to do as they pleased in Mexico and in South and in Central America.

Mr. President, there is always danger of invasion so long as greed is an attribute of the human heart. It is time for the American people to wake up and to get ready to fight, and in order to succeed to have a united country behind the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Efforts to discredit acts which have been passed by this and by former Congresses, intended purely and simply for the purpose of successfully carrying on this war, ought to cease here and now, and if it is desired to repeal them or any of them it would seem to be the part of patriotism as well as wisdom to wait until the termination of hostilities.

Mr. President, this amendment ought not to have been offered here. It ought not to be considered here. If it is worthy of consideration at all, and if in its effects it has a political rather than a patriotic significance, it ought to have been introduced as a separate measure and referred to the Military Affairs Committee, where the expert testimony of men who understand the needs of the hour and of the Army might have been adduced in order that an intelligent report might have been made. This amendment has not been considered here or anywhere. The bill increasing the pay of the soldier to $30 a month was carefully considered by the Military Affairs Committee. I opposed that increase, because I oppose a mercenary army; but over my protest the measure became a law.

The effect of this amendment—whether intentional or not the result is just the same—the effect of it will be to create dissatisfaction amongst the young men of this country and to make them feel that they are being unjustly dealt with in that they have not received higher compensation prior to the time when this proposed amendment would become operative. Not only does the insistence upon this proposed amendment create disaffection amongst the men who are to wage the battles of this war, but it cultivates disaffection amongst the people of the whole country and tends to discord rather than to that unity of sentiment which is essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

This measure, Mr. President, as well as that proposing to relieve the Army raised by the selective draft from foreign service except by their own consent, has the same effect, though in a lesser degree, as the assertion made recently by a distinguished Senator in a published interview, whether authentic or not I do not know, that our young men are being forced into a cruel and bloody war by Wall Street and the munition factories of this country, and that our allies are holding Germany down while America is stabbing her in the back.

Mr. President, never did any man publicly or privately make a more cruel, a more unpatriotic charge than that, or one more calculated to cultivate a spirit of disloyalty to country and to flag. It impeaches the integrity of the great majority of Congress—Democrats and Republicans—for, thank God, Republicans here have buried partisan politics and have patriotically united with Democrats to give the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy all that he asks in order to enable him to carry this war to a successful conclusion. Munition factories? Wall Street? Mr. President, neither had anything to do with this war, and all fair-minded men know it. If the time comes when it shall be necessary to demand of them all that they make and all that they have, I have no doubt but that the Congress of the United States will reach out and take whatever is necessary to successfully prosecute this war. But to burden the American people or any part of them with taxation which is unnecessary at this stage of the emergency would be not only unwise but unpatriotic and an injustice as well.

If, Mr. President and Senators, America is worth fighting for, if our liberties are worth preserving, if our institutions are worthy of being perpetuated, some portion of this great expenditure should be passed on to future generations, just as the generations that succeeded the Revolution, just as the generations that succeeded the War of 1812, just as the generations that succeeded the Civil War, were compelled to bear a part of the burden of those wars, because not only were they wars waged in the interest of those then living, but in the interest of those to come. And if America is submerged now, Mr. President, if our liberties are successfully assailed and our rights destroyed, there will be no future generations to enjoy the blessings of liberty, but a race of slaves.

I for one, Mr. President, hope that the Senate will promptly vote down not only this amendment, but anything that tends, like it, to demoralize the military life of the Nation, to weaken the right arm of the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. I believe that the Republicans as well as the Democrats of the Senate who, in the days gone by, have stood ready to give the President every force and every power that he has asked, will stand together now to vote down this amendment, so that it may come up, if it comes up at all again, before a committee that will have an opportunity to consider it and give it the careful attention that such a measure ought to have and that such a measure deserves.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, when I presented this amendment I did not intend to be guilty of more than one short speech in disposing of it; but the vehement and vociferous Senators who have broadened this discussion far beyond any reasonable limits are responsible. To them both I would say that if a proposition to pay these enlisted men more money is belittling and degrading, then all of them have steeped their own hands in that same infamy, because the act of May 18, 1917, doubled the salaries of privates in the Army, with a view to this very foreign service.

The Senator from Oregon proceeded in one part of his remarkable address to show that there was no need of this amendment because the soldiers got so much already, and turns around at another point in his remarkable address and asserts that after all it does not make any difference, because if we did pay them more, although he says we did, it would be making Hessians of them.

So I say to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], with his spread-eagle foolishness, why did he vote for the act of 1917 if he thinks it is wrong to pay them more? If it was belittling and insulting and degrading the American private to propose to raise his wages, why did the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Mississippi do it in May of this same year of grace, 1917? Can it be that what is right and proper in May, 1917, becomes "degrading and belittling" in September, 1917? It must be that it is belittling only when some men suggest it, and that it is righteous entirely and completely when others suggest it. So much for the wonderful argument we have heard on this phase of the question.

As far as the Senator from Minnesota is concerned, I have too much respect for his years to say what I really think about his performance to-day. That is all that restrains me, for the Senator from Minnesota with a spirit of narrow sectional meanness and bitterness to attempt to insult the great Commonwealth I represent as a Senator on this floor, and for him to suggest that he hoped Georgia would be invaded by German troops and I would meet them at the head of negro soldiers, was to present himself in his own true colors and his own true light to the people of this great Republic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 4 o'clock p. m.). The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent order heretofore made further debate is not in order and the Senate proceeds to vote upon the income-tax title and all amendments pending and all amendments that are undisposed of. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). While I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], I understand that he would vote the same way that I expect to vote on this amendment. Therefore I will vote without making any transfer of my pair. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I have been informed that on this and other amendments pending to this title of the bill he would vote as I would. I am therefore at liberty to vote. I shall let this announcement apply to further roll calls to-day. I vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is unavoidably absent on official business. I understand that if present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 5, nays 75, as follows:

YEAS—5.

Gronna	La Follette	Reed	Vardaman

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLIS. I now offer the amendment that the chairman of the committee said he would accept.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if he has changed the amendment so as to make it 15 per cent instead of 20?

Mr. HOLLIS. I have done so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the title a new section, as follows:

Sec. —. That section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended by adding at the end of subdivision (a) a further paragraph numbered 9, to read as follows:

"Ninth. Contributions or gifts actually made within the year to corporations or associations organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, or to societies for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, to an amount not in excess of 15 per cent of the taxpayer's taxable net income as computed without the benefit of this paragraph. Such contributions or gifts shall be allowable as deductions only if verified under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The only amendment of the committee undisposed of in this title will be found at the bottom of page 4, beginning with line 23, where the committee proposes to strike out the subdivision (c). It reads as follows:

and (c) the provisions requiring the normal tax of individuals to be deducted and withheld at the source of the income shall not apply to the new 2 per cent normal tax herein prescribed until on and after January 1, 1918, and thereafter shall apply only to the incomes exceeding $3,000 as provided in Title I of such act of September 8, 1916.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I submit an amendment which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 23, after the word "provided," insert:

and (c) the returns, withholding and deduction required under subdivision (d) of section 8 and subdivision (b) of section 9 of such act shall be required in the case of net incomes of $1,000 or over instead of $3,000 or over as therein provided, but shall not be so required until on and after January 1, 1918, unless the amount of such income paid on and after November 1, 1917, shall be sufficient to permit the withholding of the tax herein prescribed for the whole of the year 1917: Provided also, That in cases covered by subdivisions (c) and (d) of section 9 of such act, such withholding and deduction shall not be required until on or after January 1, 1918, and thereafter in such cases; only one 2 per cent normal tax shall at any time be deducted and withheld at the source, and any further normal tax which would otherwise be required to be deducted under this act or such act of September 8, 1916, shall be returned and paid by the person receiving such income: Provided further, That a person whose tax has been withheld at the source may in lieu of making the return required under subdivision (b) of section 8 of such act, make a written statement that other than the income on which the tax has been withheld at the source his net income does not exceed $1,000. Such statement may be furnished to the person required to withhold such income and shall be forwarded by such person with the return of the income so withheld.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the effect and the purpose of this amendment—

Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to a question of order. If debate is allowed on this amendment, I should like to have an opportunity to answer the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that debate is not in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Chair is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to reserve that in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that he can offer the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offer an amendment, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 18, strike out "$1,000 and $2,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000 and $3,000"; in line 21 strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,000"; in line 22 strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no further amendments to this title, the unanimous consent is complied with.

Mr. HARDWICK obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Have we dispensed with the unanimous-consent agreement work?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has announced that the unanimous-consent agreement, so far as this title is concerned, has been consummated. The Senate is proceeding with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in his remarks a moment ago the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] departed a good ways from the text. The text was whether or not the Congress of the United States should still further increase the pay of enlisted men when they were entering military service on foreign soil. The Senate determined, which was entirely within its province, that it would not further increase that pay. Of course, I bow, without any ill feeling or ill temper, to the decision of the Senate in that respect, although it seems to me that the argument for that course was utterly unsound and thoroughly disingenuous, because as I pointed out to the Senate, if it belittled the American Army, if it was pinning a badge of cowardice and of mercenary motive upon the American soldier to increase his pay, then we already pinned that badge to him in May, 1917, when we doubled his pay on account of this very foreign service, which was then directly in contemplation.

So there is nothing in the remarkable argument, and I use the word "argument" as a matter of courtesy strictly and solely, advanced by these two Senators on that subject, because no one contends and no one believes that either myself or the Senator from Oregon or even the Senator from Minnesota intended any such thing, or that we did any such thing when we doubled this pay a few months ago.

In the course of his argument the Senator from Oregon saw fit to give the country and the Senate a rather disconnected although somewhat full account of what he believed to be my activities with respect to certain matters. What relation they had to the subject matter then before the Senate is hard to see; but if it was the purpose of the distinguished Senator from Oregon to undertake to either lecture me or instruct me, then he has wasted his words and has spoken in vain, because I accept neither instruction nor chiding from that Senator or from any other Member of this body. For my conduct I am responsible to my constituency, and to it alone. I know my rights on this floor, and I know, I think, how to maintain them.

I shall endeavor to do so, whether it be against the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Minnesota or any other Senator who undertakes either to challenge or assail them.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in a period of excitement Senators are forgetting the cardinal, fundamental principles upon which this Government and all of our institutions rest. Is the right of free speech to be denied throughout this country or in this Chamber, dedicated by historic associations to the glories and liberties of America? Is the Senator from Georgia to be either indicted or arraigned by the Senator from Oregon because, forsooth, in the exercise of a constitutional right he presented an amendment here relating to one of the subjects upon which the Senate must legislate? Has the time come when free speech is to be denied not only to the individual citizens of the Republic but to the Senator of a great State as he stands on this floor endeavoring to discharge his duty to a great constituency? If so, we are in vastly more danger from that sort of business than we are from the Germans.

Freedom of speech, I know full well, does not warrant license; liberty does not mean license. No Senator can point to any utterance of the Senator from Georgia which can be justly criticized in that regard by any Senator, no matter how much he may differ from the Senator from Georgia in his opinions. Mr. President, has it come to pass in this Senate and in this country that free speech is to be denied; that the press is to be shackled whenever it ventures to express an independent opinion or a contrary view to that indorsed by the administration? If so, woe to the Republic; if so, this will no longer remain the land of the free.

If the time has come in this country and in this Congress when men can not anywhere freely and fearlessly express their opinions about the policy involved in any proposed law, and either support or oppose the enactment of such a law, without the slightest fear that the right to do so is to be criticized or challenged; if the time has come when throughout this country men may not advocate the repeal of any law upon the statute books without their right to do so being criticized and challenged; if the time has come when men throughout this country have not the right to test the validity, in the manner and form prescribed by the organic law of the Republic, of any statute that may be passed by Congress and approved by the Executive, then, indeed, we are at the end of liberty in this Republic and this is no longer the land of the free.

Mr. President, this thing labeled and styled patriotism of the flamboyant spread-eagle type, tongue service and lip bravery, does not appeal very strongly to me. The men who brag most fight least; and, as a rule, the men who love this country most say least about it. Ah, "The lady doth protest too much," said the great master of human nature. So whenever I see one of these distinguished gentlemen, in public life or out of it, who is so bubbling over with his patriotism and love for this country that he can not restrain this constant, useless iteration and reiteration, and can not lose a single opportunity to pluck all the feathers out of the eagle bird, I begin to wonder how much of it is the real article and how much of it is assumed. When I see men who are so brave with their voices, I wonder why they do not all go over to the firing line and themselves eat up the Germans.

Mr. President, so far as my personal connection with this debate is concerned, it is of little importance or of little interest to the country; but it seems to me that there is a lesson connected with it and growing out of it that the people of this country might well learn and that its rulers might well take to heart and give heed to. That is this: It is not always the men who insist on doing the spread-eagle act overtime who love the country most, would serve it most, or would sacrifice most for it.

It is just as well that every one of us, myself included, of course, should remember that the other man may not be less patriotic than we are because he happens to differ from us about some things.

I have believed from the beginning of this war, as my friend from Oregon knows, that the people of this free Republic would prosecute the war more vigorously, more adequately, more spiritedly, and more successfully if they were permitted to do so with a due regard for their rights, liberties, privileges, thoughts, sentiments, and feelings. I have believed that one willing freeman enrolled in the Republic's cause was worth a dozen unwilling conscripts, dragged to do the Nation's bidding. I think so yet.

Undoubtedly, Mr. President, at the beginning of this war the majority of the American people had no other idea but that it was to be largely a naval warfare; largely conducted on the high seas, where our rights had been denied, where the offense to us had been given. If my memory serves me correctly, I was the first Member of either House of Congress, certainly of this body, to suggest, in addition to that, that we ought to send at once for its effect upon the morale of the nations engaged in this struggle the best division of Regulars we could raise in the United States Army. I thought from the beginning, as I think yet, that we ought to have sent to the front in Europe the Regular Army of the United States, all of the militia that were willing to go, and that would have meant 100 per cent fine, in my judgment, and hundreds of thousands of volunteers, whom I believe the patriotic spirit of the country would furnish, if it was properly appealed to and thoroughly aroused.

From those forces we could have gotten an army of from three-quarters of a million to a million men, and we could have gotten it in France a great deal quicker than we are going to get into France the army now being raised. Be that as it may, the die is cast; the Congress of the United States has decreed otherwise. In its superior wisdom it has determined to follow the other plan, and any Senator of the United States or any citizen of the United States, here or elsewhere, who intimates that the junior Senator from Georgia has done anything in the world to encourage resistance to the law, has done anything in the world more than to assert his undoubted and his constitutional right, if we still have a free country, is guilty of conduct that I can not properly characterize under the rules of this body, but which I will be very glad to characterize for him elsewhere if he will give me the chance.

Still, I do not consider that I or any other Senator who feels as I do on this question does the country a disservice if he continues to urge, so far as he can under the Constitution and laws of the land and the rules of this body, his views upon this great question; for if, perchance, it should turn out that our views are right, that the American people would prosecute this war with more vigor, with more willingness, with more spirit, and with more real patriotism if they are permitted to prosecute it one way than they are likely to do under another plan, then, of course, it goes without saying that even Senators who have entertained the other view and who have adopted the other course would be glad enough to change it, so that we may get from our country and our countrymen the very best that is in them and of them.

Yet, Mr. President, I must confess that it makes me sad beyond my power to express that feeling to the Senate; it discourages me far beyond my power to portray it to this body when I see the spirit of intolerance, the spirit of suppression, the spirit of oppression, if you please, that seems to me to lurk in these times.

I understand full well—no Senator understands it better—how necessary it is, how absolutely essential it is, that we present a united front to our common foe, and when the time comes to present that front no Senator will do more than the Senator from Georgia in an effort to accomplish it. I would not, if I could, interfere in the minutest particular or in the smallest degree with the conduct of this war by the military authorities according to their own conception of what is the best way to execute the plans that they must formulate. I realize full well that the war can not be fought, when it comes to the waging of campaigns, by 96 Senators and 435 Representatives; I have never had such a thought nor such a purpose in my mind at any time at any period; but I do say that in the consideration and decision of the great civic, industrial, political, and social questions which must arise during the preparation for the conduct of this war it is the duty of this body and the House of Representatives of the United States to exercise, without the slightest abdication, each and every constitutional function that the Congress possesses.

The Constitution under which we live and which we have all sworn to support, from the President down, prescribes that the power to raise and support armies is vested not in the War Department, nor yet in the President of the United States, but in the Congress of the United States. Why? Because the power to raise and support armies is a great civic question that precedes the war, is anterior to its prosecution, and disconnected with its prosecution except in a remote sense. It is a question in which are involved the lives and liberties and cherished rights of the American people. Therefore the Constitution wisely lodged that power, not in the Executive, but in the representatives of the people, who sit in the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, the duty rested on Congress to determine in what way this Army should be raised. The Congress determined it in a measure—in a way—and yet under pressure of which no one of us can be ignorant and under influence that no one of us can ignore. When we entered upon the performance of that duty we were met at the very threshold of the consideration of the question by the contention that it was our duty to take, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," the opinion of the President of the United States; and when we began to investigate a little what that opinion was and where it came from, we found that the opinion of the President of the United States was not his own opinion at all, but the opinion of the War Department, and that the opinion of the War Department of the United States was not solely its own opinion, but was the opinion of some War College board and of the West Point authorities; so that, after all, what we did was to adopt the opinion and plan of the militarists of this country.

I can understand in a way why that argument swept the Congress with such potent and irresistible force, because naturally, with reference to military matters, we desire to have the advice of military people; but it does seem to me that the mistake was, is, and has been from the beginning, that this question of raising an army was not so much of a military question as it was a civic question.

Be that as it may, as I said a moment ago, the die is cast. Mr. President, I do not believe that the selective-draft law is constitutional, for reasons which I have explained to the Senate, and which I will not repeat. At the same time, Mr. President, my belief rests so largely on history—the history of both English and American liberty—so largely upon construction, that I can see how other men may honestly entertain a different view, may believe that the power to raise and support armies includes the power of conscription even for foreign service. I can see how that may be true either in the halls of Congress or in the chambers of the courts. And although I am not shaken or weakened in my faith on that question—it is not necessary for me to state that to a body in which I have served even the short length of time that I have served in this body—yet I do think that that question ought to be settled at the earliest practicable moment by the highest tribunal in our land, the Supreme Court of the United States, the final guardian of the rights and liberties of the American citizen; and I think every one of us will do a service to this country if we facilitate as much as we can the settlement and determination of that question in that court.

I admit that the draft act has been declared the law of the land by every inferior court that has considered it so far, but let me say in passing that none of the opinions have been either persuasive nor convincing. The one in my own State sounded more like a speech than an opinion, like a piece of rhetoric rather than a well-reasoned decision, although I do not intend by any means to reflect either on the court or on the judge who rendered the decision. I have no doubt that he was just as honest in his opinion as I know I am in mine. At any rate, it neither persuaded nor convinced me. Besides, that case, as well as some of the other cases, went off upon the proposition that this act was unconstitutional because it was in violation of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. I do not believe that contention, and never have for a moment. The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution related to slavery, and nothing else. There are other, and in my opinion far stronger, grounds upon which the argument rests. Be that as it may, that question is to be settled at an early date in this tribunal here, the highest court in the Republic; and to its decision, the decision of the Supreme Court when rendered, no man can do anything else but render obedience and bow in submission, even if he does not think the decision is right, as I sometimes do not think some of its decisions are right. But, Mr. President, it will be difficult indeed to chain either freedom of thought or freedom of speech in this Republic, and by such an effort we will gain little either of domestic happiness or of foreign glory. Our people, as I have said repeatedly, will fight better and longer and stronger if their rights and liberties are not ignored and overridden.

If it be true that newspapers can be suppressed and citizens arrested throughout the Republic on the ground and for the reason that they have ventured, forsooth, to disagree to some policy of the Government; that they have ventured, forsooth, to oppose the policy involved in some law; or, still more venturesome, they have essayed to criticize the law in question and to advocate its repeal; or, still worse, still more horrible, that they have ventured to appeal to the courts in order to have the validity of such statutes determined in the manner and form provided by the Constitution of our country—if that is your policy, you will have a good deal of trouble in free America before it is over.

You can not chain thought in this country. The blood that was shed for freedom more than a hundred years ago still flows in the veins of the sons and descendants of the men who shed it. Free America, with free speech denied, with the term "free press" made a mockery, with the right of the citizen or the public man to advocate the repeal of a law criticized and challenged—a free America of that sort would be a travesty on the name and a travesty on the glories of its past history.

Mr. President, make no mistake about these matters. They concern deeply the safety of the Republic. They concern deeply the happiness, the security, the liberties of the American people. And do not suppose that men who feel this way are pro-Germans, or anything else but the best American citizens in this Republic to-day. They are pro-Americans above everything else. They are pro-liberty, and not pro-German. They love this country just as much as any of you gentlemen who are so vociferous along some of these lines. They would serve it just as well, yea, far better; they would sacrifice, and have sacrificed, just as much as some of these other gentlemen would or have.

Why, not so very long ago I heard the life story of a great American lawyer, a man of high public place, who breathes patriotism, who literally exhales draft and conscription from his very system when he breathes and lives and moves. I had occasion to look into the life history of that gentleman and I found that for all that he was so vociferous about drafting other people, when he had passed far beyond the draft age himself, that when he was within the draft age and when he faced a real war himself he hired a substitute to do his fighting!

So I say, if you want, as doubtless all of you do, a reunited country—with every trace of sectional hate and of sectional feeling removed from it, with every man in it willing to die for the flag—let us not ignore the dearest rights of the American people. Let us be tender, solicitous, patient, long-suffering with them and toward them.

Ah, Senators, you like to speak of our English allies. It is always pleasing to me to hear it. I am pure-blooded English myself, in descent and ancestry. Let me commend to you one principle that has been the great safety valve of Great Britain. To-day you can see in Hyde Park a forum dedicated to free speech. There any day or any night any Englishman or any other human being within all the realm, in peace or in war, can mount the forum and express with perfect safety and absolute freedom his opinion about any subject on this earth, unmolested and protected from molestation. There has been always that privilege in England. It exists there to-day, unimpaired by the storms of war. The sacredness with which it has been observed has been always the great safety valve of liberty, of freedom in England and throughout the world. Let us not in this country forget that lesson of our English kin.

Mr. President, until recently, I am not sure whether it is published now or not, there has been published in New York City a satirical publication called Bull. Bull was edited until recently, at least, by a Kentucky Democrat. I have forgotten his name; I think it was Bedford. Bull published not long ago—and since its publication, I am informed because of it, it ceased to circulate through the mails—this skit:

Scene: Magistrate Murphy's court in New York.

Enter a policeman dragging a citizen, John Smith, by the arm. Magistrate Murphy demands, "Mr. Policeman, what is the defendant charged with?" The policeman answers, "Reading the Declaration of Independence in public, your honor." Magistrate Murphy, "What do you say, Mr. Defendant, guilty or not guilty?" The defendant, pretty badly frightened, I reckon, said, "Your honor, I suppose I am guilty of reading the Declaration of Independence in public." "Thirty days," says Magistrate Murphy, "and I wish I had the blankety blank scoundrel here who wrote it." It is incredible that conditions that excited anything like that portrayal could exist anywhere in this country, yet the fact is that they did, I was informed. I have taken the trouble to verify that much of it, and the circumstance which inspired this skit was about this: A man in New York got up a circular composed of two or three quotations from the Declaration of Independence verbatim et literatim—there was no dispute about the accuracy of the quotations—and two or three quotations from Washington's Farewell Address. A monstrous crime that! At the bottom of his circular he put this simple question and it was his sole contribution to the literature. "Is our Government living up to these principles?" For that they arrested him and threw him in jail, I suppose under the espionage act that we passed. One regret of my life is that I voted for that act in any form, although I did my best to amend it so as to safeguard the liberties of both the people and the press.

They put him in jail, and it took a writ of habeas corpus in the district court of the United States to release from prison a man whose only offense was asking the question whether our Government had lived up to certain principles in the Declaration of Independence and in George Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. President, I submit that is not right. It is everlastingly wrong. It is tyrannical. It is despotic. As long as men in authority pursue that sort of pathway they can never force the American people to do their will. If they can, then the people are not fit to be free. If they can, freedom is a name and a mockery, and not a fact and a substance, in this great country of ours.

Now, Mr. President, that leads me up to what I wanted to say when I started out in the beginning. In this country, whatever laws Congress passes—whether it is on a military subject or any other—in the manner and form required by the Constitution shall receive my obedience and support unqualifiedly as long as they remain the law, until they are either declared invalid by the courts, acting also under the constitutional form and authority, or until they are repealed by the representatives of the people who are to come after us; but until one or the other of these contingencies shall happen they are the law of the land, and as such deserve obedience, even to the most minute detail, from every citizen of this Republic who, believes in law and order under a constitutional form of government.

The insinuation by anybody on this floor or elsewhere that at any time I have ever entertained sentiments different from that, have expressed thoughts different from that, or have felt differently from that is absolutely and unqualifiedly false. I have said, and I do think the people of this country have a right, regardless of what Congress might do or the courts might hold, to exercise the supreme and final power of freemen, when they come to cast their ballots next, not to support for election or for reelection to office men who have been proposing and passing laws from which they utterly and thoroughly dissent. If any Senator can find fault with that statement, he will surprise me.

But, Mr. President, I am getting somewhat weary, and so far as it lies in my power I am going to take a somewhat drastic method to end it, so far as any manifestation of it in my presence is concerned at least, of all statements and insinuations and falsehoods out of either the whole cloth or half cloth, to the effect that the Senator from Georgia is not just as good a patriot as the Senator from that Northwestern State up there, Minnesota I think it is, or Oregon, or anywhere else; that the Senator from Georgia does not love his country just as much as anybody else; and that the Senator from Georgia, whatever mistakes of the head he may make, has any other purpose than the glory and the success, the liberty and the safety of our common country. Other men may take different views about questions which may arise. Other men may believe in and may advocate different things from what the Senator from Georgia believes in and advocates. Those other men have no right, Mr. President, in truth or in justice, to clothe themselves in the robes of self-righteous phariseism and claim for their own opinions infallibility, for their own views virtue, and for themselves patriotism and exclusive patriotism. It is just as well that the country should realize, that we all should realize, that the administration should realize, that the world should realize that this is still a country of free speech and of free thought; that men here are neither to be bought, bulldozed, or intimidated; not in free America at least, whatever may be done or submitted to elsewhere.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I take it that there are very few Senators—probably not over five—who will not agree with me that we have seldom witnessed a finer case of self-inflation and puffed-up acting than that which has just been shown upon this arena by the junior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. REED. The language just used is unparliamentary, in my opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I deny that the language is unparliamentary.

Mr. REED. I submit it to the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Chair rules that it is, I will withdraw it. Let us have a ruling.

Mr. REED. If that be parliamentary, then everything is parliamentary.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi did the Senator from Georgia—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not until the point of order is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will read clause 2 of Rule XIX:

2. No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

The present occupant of the chair has no discretion in passing upon the propriety of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi except as authorized by that rule, and he does not think that the language used is a violation of the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have imputed no conduct nor any motive to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that, in view of the personal relations between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Mississippi, if the Senator from Mississippi has any sentiment of that kind that he would like to express to or about the Senator from Georgia the Senate floor is not the proper place for that expression.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that all?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all for the present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, everybody who knows me knows that if the personal relation cut any figure at all it would have made me hesitate in making my expression as strong as I otherwise would have made it. Now, I say puffed-up acting because the Senator has acted the part here of a self-alleged martyr, the part of a man who claims that he has been "denied free speech." Nobody has denied the Senator free speech. The fact that the Senator spoke was sufficient to prove that that was not true. The Senator from Oregon did not deny him free speech. He merely answered a foolish speech. Free speech denied and foolish speech answered are two different things. The Senator from Oregon answered it with a generosity and a manliness and a patriotism and an outspokenness and generous impulsive warmth that made almost every heart in this Chamber beat responsive to what he said. I was never before so proud of the fact that the Senator from Oregon was born and raised in the State of Mississippi.

Then the junior Senator from Georgia, a little bit later on, proceeds to call the utterances of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], gray-haired old veteran, "spread-eagle foolishness." This epitome of manhood and valor from Georgia, to whom was he using that language? A man who bore a musket four years during the Civil War and never got higher than a corporal, and that at the very close of it.

And what was this "spread eagleism" to which he referred? Just a talk lauding Americanism, and if certain men do not regard all talk of patriotism as hypocrisy and spread eagleism there was nothing spread eagle about it, just a talk about the duty of loyalty to the American Republic and a summoning of people to loyalty to the American Republic, and a scolding of the bad Americanism of those irresponsible to the summons. Why, God bless him, the fine, old viking! Minnesota has honored herself, Republican as he is, every time she has sent him here. He is a man, every inch of him. He was when he was young and he is now when he is old. He has been a Nestor in his wisdom and an Achilles in his courage, and it remained for the junior Senator from Georgia to speak of his "spread-eagle foolishness." Spread eagleism with a musket on his shoulder for four years! That is the sort of spread eagleism which we want now. He did not go around and talk about the Constitution when there was no constitutional point involved. He took his musket and fought on the side that he thought was right and which many of us thought was wrong. So much for that.

Mr. President, I do not doubt in the slightest degree the word of the Senator from Georgia, because I never had any reason to doubt it on this or any other occasion. When he says that he has not "advised" any resistance to the draft law now upon the statute books, I do not doubt that in the slightest degree; the junior Senator from Georgia even is good enough lawyer to have avoided that trap; but when a man who is a Senator of the United States, and has the reputation of being a lawyer, says that the draft law is unconstitutional, poor, ignorant people down in Georgia and elsewhere draw their own inferences. They have been taught that an unconstitutional law is no law, and that it is the duty of a citizen to resist it. They draw the inference that if it is unconstitutional they have a right to resist it. Very many of them know no better. They can not take the position that they must wait until the Supreme Court agrees with them, or rather agrees with the Senator from Georgia. Of course, there is no man who ever went to a law school for six months who believes that a selective-draft law is unconstitutional; but these people who are affected by these utterances do not know that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi refuses to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I refuse only at this moment. These men therefore hold meetings and begin to advise resistance to the law until finally some poor, ignorant devil will be thrown into jail and perhaps some one, if he takes the advice which they get, by wrong inference from the Senator's position, and adds to it the overt act of actual forcible resistance, may suffer death. Who will be responsible for it—the poor fellow who knew no better, and thought he was acting with patriotism and defending free speech, or those who, without intention of it, unguardedly put the spirit into his bosom that led him to the act? So speeches like that do virtually encourage resistance to the law—not advise it, but encourage it.

There is one other little question to which I desire to refer. A great deal has been said about confiscating the manhood of the country and not confiscating its wealth. Something has been said about "a rich man's war and the poor man's fight." There is no such thing as arguing with a lie. All you can do is to brand it as such. When anybody says that this is "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight" he simply lies. If he does not know better, he unconsciously makes a false statement; if he knows better, he lies consciously. This draft law does not take the poor man alone; it takes rich and poor and high and low. That is the beauty of it. That is the very democracy and equity and justice and right of it. Instead of leaving the country's battles to be fought by the brave and the generous and the patriotic, leaving in their rear those of more callous soul and less acute sensitiveness to duty to propagate the next generation, we say it is the duty of every man to fight for his country at the proper time, just as it is the duty of every man to pay taxes when called upon by the law to do so, and of them we summon a certain number.

Unconstitutional! One of the first laws ever passed was that in 1789, declaring that every man in the United States between the ages of 18 and 45—I believe those were the ages—was "liable to military duty" and could be called upon by the Government at any time. There has not been a war of any magnitude fought by the United States but what there was a draft law; and when there was another government of a part of the United States—or the then temporarily disunited States—formed upon this continent, which existed for four years, and which has been described as "A storm-cradled Nation, which rose and fell without a stain," it, too, had a draft law. Yet it remains for the junior Senator from Georgia to discover that a draft law is unconstitutional! The President, the Congress in both branches, sworn to defend the Constitution, and everybody have violated the Constitution; and there is nobody to stand up as "the sentinel upon the watchtower" and warn them of their grievous error except the junior Senator from Georgia and a few others somewhat like him. What are we "confiscating" of the manhood of the country?—to use the word "confiscating," and I deny that anybody has a right to use it, for, in the right sense, it is only a summons to the colors. Instead of summoning all the manhood of America, as we had a right to do, we said "No; we will take simply the men between the ages of 21 and 31, inclusive." We have summoned them because we think they will be enough. So, instead of "confiscating" all the manhood we have confiscated about one-tenth of the population, or about 10,000,000 men as being subject to draft. Then, out of the number subject to draft we are actually to draw a million—about one-tenth of the one-tenth. So we have "confiscated" one-tenth of one-tenth of the population of the United States. The wealth of the United States would be mighty glad to get off at 10 per cent of 10 per cent.

That is not all. The men who pay the taxes are fighting in the trenches, or will be when the time comes, as well as those who will pay little or no taxes. They are training for it now. It is not merely the man who does not pay any taxes that is going to fight this war. The sons of the rich will be shoulder to shoulder with the sons of the poor; and I venture to say that there will be as large a percentage of the former, in proportion to their numbers, as of the latter. I who say this hold no brief for either; I am neither rich nor poor. So the rich are performing the double duty—of their bodies they give and of their wealth they give. The draft is the only fair and democratic way to provide for raising soldiers. It lays an equal duty upon all between certain ages. No substitutes are allowed; no man can pay his way out, as was the case in the North during the Civil War. If a man is to be exempt at all, he must show certain things. Of those things a dependent wife and child or wife and children are one. When the man has money enough to support wife and children without his personal endeavors, when he has investments sufficient, he is not exempt, while the man who is so poor that it takes his manual or personal labor to do it is exempt, and that is right, everlastingly and eternally right.

Now, about the cause of the war. Mr. President, a man who would not fight for his country under the provocation that we have received would not fight if a man came into his house and slapped his wife's jaws. Down went the Lusitania; unwarned, unknelt, and unsung down went 200 American women and children, in violation of every international law that the world has recognized for over 200 years. We took up the question with the Emperor of Germany. We said, "You have violated all the laws of nations; you must apologize and you must promise not to do it again." That was the substance of it. We did not ask an indemnity, I believe; we stopped short of that. We palavered and palavered and palavered on both sides. The German Court showed a capacity for oriental diplomacy, whose forte is evasion and delay, that neither Constantinople nor Peking ever excelled. After a long, long time we pinned them down; but in the meanwhile they had sunk the Sussex and the Arabic, I believe, and several other ships.

We pinned them down, and then they promised that they would quit it; that hereafter they would visit and search the ship for contraband and that hereafter they would not destroy the ship, even if contraband were found, without providing for the safety of the noncombatant crew and passengers aboard; and they tied to that a string, in which they said that if Great Britain would not behave herself better in the future maybe they would begin it again. The President, with long-suffering patience, replied and said, "I will accept your note, but I do not accept your limitation in it." Then the Kaiser, with the duplicity that has characterized his course, made no reply; silence gave consent. Then, when the proper time came and he had secured enough submarines ready to do the work, he gave us notice that he believed he would begin again. In the meanwhile the American flag had been at least twice fired upon on the high seas flying from the masts of our ships Gulflight and Algonquin. Even those men who would not be provoked to a fight by the fact that our women and children were sunk upon the ships of other nations—some of them the property of citizens of Great Britain—it would seem might have been stung to some degree of righteous and patriotic indignation when the flag was fired upon on the Gulflight and upon the Algonquin.

That is not all; the Kaiser added insult to injury. A gentleman can stand injury now and then; in generosity of soul he may forgive it; but he can not stand the sting of insult. They quietly informed us of the fact that they would permit us—permit us!—Germany, military autocracy, miserable training school for servile "efficiency," would permit the citizens of a great and free Republic! to travel upon the high seas, which are the property of no nation, but God's gift to all, on their way to Europe once a week to one port, provided we painted our ships like the signs of a movie-picture show or like a barber's pole! Yet men have not their hearts stirred to indignation! I repeat that a man who would not fight for his country under the provocations that we have received and who would be unwilling to see others fight for it would not fight if a man stepped into his front door and slapped his wife's face, if the other man was bigger than he was. The die has been cast; our lance is at rest; he is a laggard who doubts and a dastard who halts.

Mr. President, there is just this question I want to put to every American and every American can line up on it: Are you lukewarm in this war, or are you in earnest? Are you half-hearted, or are you whole-hearted? If you are half-hearted, you are half disloyal. Tell me that our patriotism ought to be confined to waiting here until the Germans come—if they ever should come—making a promise to fight here, with the hope that we will never have any fight at all. Cowardly hope! Tell me that we must not go abroad where the trenches are inviting us to fight, and keep on fighting until at the end of this war Germany shall apologize for the Lusitania and the other sinkings and shall promise that at no future date in any war shall she ever carry on submarine warfare against merchant ships, sinking noncombatants without carrying them to a port of safety, and until she pays indemnity to the heirs of those who were murdered and assassinated upon the high seas.

Not going after her? Going to wait till she comes after us? Is there any better way of playing into her hands? Going to let her come after us! Do you suppose she is fool enough to try it right now? If she whips those fellows over there—as the Senator from Oregon said, if she gets rid of them—you can make up your minds you have got to fight her by yourselves, unless we give up the Monroe doctrine, because having made of Belgium a servile State, of France a vassal State, of the Balkans just what she wants, having secured her way to Bagdad, on the road to Asia Minor—if she can win the war in Europe—she will say to us, virtually repeating what Bismarck said, that "the Monroe doctrine is a piece of international insolence" and pay no further attention to it. Wait for her here! Not go after her there! Patriotic here; no need to be patriotic there!

The Senator from Georgia later on boasted that he is simply pro-American. Well, he may be, but, as the fellow said to a naked man who was boasting about his devotion to the cause of decency, he has a very poor way of showing it. [Laughter.]

The time for criticism is past. We are in the ring; time has been called. The Senator is alarmed, or I believe he said "distressed at the intolerance" of the country. I am not; I hope to God the day will never come when the American people will be tolerant of those who, after once America has put on her helmet and drawn her sword, do not show enthusiastic and outspoken and earnest patriotic feeling in deeds if summoned—in words when deeds of high emprise can not be performed.

There is a sort of an intolerance which is patriotism, just as there is a sort of an intolerance of immorality which constitutes a religion.

Another thing: I hope the time will never come when America will be tolerant of those who, even unconsciously, "aid and abet the public enemy," whether by act or by speech, consciously or unconsciously.

Beware
Of entrance to a quarrel; but being in,
Bear 't that the opposed may beware of thee.

The time to discuss this draft law was before it was adopted; and yet, after its adoption, men in both Houses who opposed it have been showering the country and their constituents with the speeches which they made denouncing it in every way in the world.

The poor fellow who gets the speech after the draft law has become a law does not make the distinction. He does not count upon the fact that what was said in denunciation of it was said before it was a law. Of course the date when the speech was made is on it, but he reads the speech itself as of the date of his reading, and he says to himself: "Here is a letter and here is a speech from Senator WILLIAMS, of Mississippi. He tells me that this draft law is hellish, that it is tyrannical, that it is undemocratic, that it is unconstitutional, and I will trust JOHN WILLIAMS; and if he can say that in Washington I ought to be allowed to say it and act upon it here. I will not submit to tyranny." And he is right about that, too. But the Constitution says that no man shall be questioned for any utterance upon this floor or the floor of the other House, and Senators and Congressmen can say things which a citizen outside of the walls of these two Houses might be prosecuted for saying. All right, except that it misleads those who are not constitutional lawyers.

Now, do not misunderstand me. I do not mean that the Senator from Georgia said anything of that kind. He did not. He has been very careful not to. But I do say that that might occur, and that in some cases, in one or the other of the two Houses—I do not want to violate the rules—it has occurred, and the speeches that were made before the draft law became a law of the United States have been spread broadcast since it became a law; and the poor fellow who reads the speech thinks that what he reads was said about it after the law was enacted.

Mr. President, I am not excited about this business. So far as I am concerned, my relationship to it intellectually is perfectly cool and cold. The Senator from Georgia could not have been worse mistaken if he had mistaken a crawfish for an elephant than he was when he announced that because the personal relations between us are not kindly that was the reason why I wanted to make a reply to his argument. I have hesitated about making a reply to some of the arguments of more than one Senator upon this floor because our personal relations were not kindly, and I was therefore afraid it would be misinterpreted. For the purposes of my reply I would very much rather that the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from Nevada had made the speech rather than the Senator from Georgia, or that some other man whom I love and who is a friend of mine had made it; then I would have said more than I have said, because I would have known that he would have known that it carried with it nothing of personal import.

Every word uttered here goes through our numberless German spies first to Spain or to Holland and thence to Germany. Every word uttered here that looks like aiding and abetting our enemy, that looks to him like lukewarmness and cold-heartedness in this great world struggle for a place in the sun—not only for democracy, as the President said, but for peace, a just and enduring peace—goes across through those neutral countries to Berlin and to the German newspapers and to the German military coterie of generals and admirals who are so powerful that they control the Emperor himself, for he is their puppet.

Men talk to me now and then about a revolution in Germany. There may be one, but I do not believe it. I believe that if one comes, it will come about the time the Kaiser takes a notion that he wants to make peace, and that probably then the junkers and the coterie of generals and admirals, headed by the crown prince, may set him aside and put the crown prince on the throne before the people know what they are doing, and see it through "by saber right," as the Germans call it, because by that time they will realize that that is the only way of saving themselves at home, whether they have lost the war or won it. But every word uttered here goes across there and is magnified. Everything the effect of which, notwithstanding the absence of any intention—not attributing any, not wanting to, nor even insinuating any—but everything the effect of which, the consequence of which would be to weaken the power of the United States to carry on war—as would have been the case if the amendment of the junior Senator from Georgia a moment ago defeated had been adopted, because it would have unnecessarily abstracted from our munitions and our guns just that much money—that all goes across the seas to German court and junker and press. The words of a Member of the House of Representatives and an ex-Senator, spoken out here the other day in Chicago, I believe, arraigning and criticizing the whole administration, will look, by the time they get there—magnified as they are by the haze of ignorance and distance between us—as if there were a rebellion of some sort in the United States among its highest officers. Every little race riot is magnified by the same haze of distance and ignorance.

Now, for God's sake, let us remember that the die is cast. The sword is drawn. The helmet is on. Our boys are in it, our begotten sons. Every word of criticism of war measures that have become law has a tendency, if not an actual effect, to prolong the struggle, to keep our boys that much longer in the trenches after they get there—to destroy all hope of Germany backing down before they get there. A united citizenry, singing one song and speaking one voice, and that a voice of acclaim of America and of free institutions and democracy and of an enduring and just peace—that it is which ought to be a part of the desire and a part of the conduct and a part of the heart-song and utterance of every American citizen.

The draft law was adopted by a vote of 81 to 8. The junior Senator from Georgia was one of the eight; and, unless I misheard him or misremember what he said, he said that day that while opposing the draft law with all of his vigor, if it were passed he was going to stand by it and by the President, I believe he said that, though I am not sure; but, anyhow, the intent and meaning of it, as I took it in, was that after it became a law of his country he would cease his opposition to it.

Now, I appeal to everybody to do that. I believe in teamwork, not only in a great thing like country, but even in little things. Here is this revenue bill, for example. There are half a dozen things in it that I did not want; that I do not think ought to be there; but the matter having been decided by the other men having as good sense as I have, and some of them a good deal better sense, that settles it for me, and I come in and support it. But, above all things, when your country, your motherland—how much sweeter than fatherland—decides anything, then you are bound by it. Stand by it, unless your country should decide something against you that you can not even contemplate the possibility of—like denying your right to worship God after your own way.

The Senator tells us we have no freedom of the press and no freedom of speech. I deny it. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Canada to the Gulf, the press is free, and speech is free. We have free speech; but we have not and will not "tolerate" disloyal speech. We are not going to have it, because that is "aiding and abetting the enemy"; and if not treason, because of the absence of an overt act, it is at least treason inchoate—in the egg—in the shell and about to be born—a live danger and vice—a live snake.

We do not deny the right of freedom of speech when we deny the right of disloyalty of speech during the war. You do not deny the right of free assembly when you deny the right of men to assemble with arms in their hands for the purpose of opposing the Government. In the case that the Senator has quoted, though I know nothing about it, I doubt not, if it is examined, that it will be found that these men were carrying those banners with those quotations on them, with a little innocent addendum, where it made it a violation of the "street-traffic laws," or something "calculated to bring on a disturbance of the peace," or "an obstruction of traffic" to carry them—not because of what was on the banners, but because of where and how they were displaying them. I know nothing about it, but I am willing to wager odds that that will be found to be the case.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I thought I should. But I can not leave this subject without an appeal to everybody. I do not care what his past position was, I do not care what his opinions were before, to get together now; to stand like a Spartan phalanx, with shields interlocked, until this miserable, insensate war is over, and until we can say to our children's children, when they begin to bear their part in paying for carrying it on to a successful issue: "You see, it was worth it. We have got the world to a point where disputes are going to be settled by reason, by international arbitration, and not by force. We have got it to a point where little countries can not be run over and downtrodden by big ones just because they are strong enough and big enough to be able to do it. We have got things to the point where there is room enough in the world for unchecked progress, for democracy, and for intellectual and moral and industrial development in peace, and where, instead of preparing in peace for war, we shall prepare in peace, thank God, day by day unto the perfect day for more and more peace."

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Friday, September 7, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, September 8, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 7, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Teach us, O Lord, Thy ways and give us the grace to walk therein, that our work may be in consonance with Thy will. It is written:

"The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple:

"The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes:

"The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.

"More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.

"Moreover, by them is Thy servant warned, and in keeping of them there is great reward.

"Who can understand his errors? Cleanse Thou me from secret faults.

"Keep back Thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

"Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer."

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL CHAPLAINS AT LARGE FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 5271, authorizing the appointment of 20 chaplains at large for the Army of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5271) authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President may appoint not exceeding 20 chaplains at large for the United States Army representing religious sects not recognized in the apportionment of chaplains now recognized by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from New York. I observe by the report of the Secretary of War that he said, in his judgment, 10 additional chaplains are all that are necessary. Yet the committee has reported 20.

Mr. SIEGEL. I can explain that very readily to the gentleman from Illinois. Two letters have been written, and—

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will excuse me right there, I think he will find that both letters say that to him.

Mr. SIEGEL. I can explain why it is submitted.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The bill reads, as I understand it, "Not exceeding 20," so that the Secretary will not have to appoint more than 10.

Mr. SIEGEL. The bill reads, "Not exceeding 20," and the idea originally was that these chaplains will be confined to the camps in the United States, of which we have 37, and the camps over in France. Then 20 base hospitals were provided for, and we can readily see that 37 camps, as well as training camps, and all the hospitals in the United States and the camps in France can not be covered by 10 chaplains, particularly when those 10 chaplains are not going to be of one particular faith. At the present time 36 per cent are of the Catholic faith and 64 per cent of the Protestant faith.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not opposed to having the necessary number of chaplains, whatever it may be; but it seems to me that when the Secretary of War recommends 10 and the committee reports 20, some reason should be given for the increase.

Mr. SIEGEL. The Secretary wrote two letters as to that, as I was about to say before. He wrote one letter, dated June 19, in which he calls particular attention to the fact that although you have reserve officers you have no reserve chaplains from which you can draw for base hospitals. Then he wrote a second letter under date of July 7, in which he recommended my first bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he not say in the second letter that he needs only 10 instead of 20?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will read both letters. And I might say that there were two bills introduced by me. They read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5271) authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President may appoint not exceeding 20 chaplains at large for the United States Army representing religious sects not recognized in the apportionment of chaplains now recognized by law.

A bill (H. R. 5793) authorizing appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President alone may appoint for the period of the existing emergency not exceeding 20 chaplains at large for the United States Army, 12 as representing religious sects not recognized in the apportionment of chaplains now provided by law and 8 for service in base hospitals, and such number of chaplains as he may determine to be necessary for service at training camps, cantonments, recruit depots, and in the National Army, selected from prominent clergy and ministers who have served at the front with the allied armies but who have passed the age limit prescribed by law for appointment in the Regular Army.

The Military Committee recommended the first one I read, as it is shorter in form.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is the bill now under consideration?

The SPEAKER. No. They want to ascertain first if they can get unanimous consent to consider it.

Mr. COX. I object at this time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

DEFECTIVE SMALL-ARMS AMMUNITION.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 133, providing for an investigation of the manufacture and purchase of small-arms ammunition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 133, to investigate the defects in the ammunition sent to Pershing's Army. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 133.

Whereas current rumors are afloat to the effect that a substantial portion of the small-arms ammunition shipped to the American expeditionary forces in France are worthless; and Whereas it is necessary that these rumors should be fully investigated: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of seven Members from the membership of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into the small-arms ammunition which has been sent to the American expeditionary forces in France; and for such purposes it shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time.

With committee amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "small arms" and insert the words "manufacture and purchase of ordnance and."

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words beginning in line 5, "which has been sent to the American expeditionary forces in France," and insert the words "including small-arms ammunition and heavy artillery for use by the armed forces of the United States in the present emergency," so that as amended the resolution will read: "Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of seven Members from the membership of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into the manufacture and purchase of ordnance and ammunition, including small-arms ammunition and heavy artillery for use by the armed forces of the United States in the present emergency, and for such purposes it shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths and have the right to report at any time."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I would like to state that I have in my possession a statement by the employees of the arsenal where this ammunition was made, and that I should like to have it considered in connection with this resolution.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can not submit it to the committee until the committee is appointed.

The SPEAKER. Whatever the gentleman may have may throw a good deal of light on the subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have some data which throws a great deal of light on the subject.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if this resolution goes through we will be very glad to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and to have him give us any information he has.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Answering the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], I wish to say that I have a statement from the employees of the arsenal where this ammunition was made which indicates that all the ammunition that went out of the arsenal was thoroughly inspected. The officers who inspected the ammunition are, of course, available for such testimony as the committee may desire to adduce; but I should like to have the statement placed in the Record in conjunction with this resolution, and shall ask unanimous consent that the statement of the employees be inserted in the Record if the resolution passes. It will be informative to the committee and will enable the committee to call witnesses additional, perhaps, to those that might otherwise be called.

Mr. GARNER. Let us see first if there is unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say further that perhaps the leading inspector of this ammunition was no less an officer of the Army of the United States than the former mayor of New York, Maj. George B. McClellan, and that there were other officers who inspected this ammunition, who, of course, ought to be called upon to testify if there is to be any inquiry of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to print in the Record a certain statement of the employees of the factory that made this ammunition complained of. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that ought to be done unless the resolution is considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FOSTER. I object until we see whether the resolution is considered or not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when it was suggested that there be a committee, a majority of which should be members of the Democratic faith, to look after expenditures under our enormous billions of dollars appropriation laws we were told repeatedly that there are already committees authorized to investigate and keep track of such expenditures. We were reminded that we have a committee to keep track of the expenditures in the War Department. Now, when there is a committee, the members of which are most closely associated with the bureau chiefs and other officials of the War Department, closest to them socially and in other ways, why should that particular committee be appointed to make this investigation? We have a committee, we have been told, whose primary function it is to investigate expenditures in the War Department. There is no necessity for the special committee, and I object.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] is recognized.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2688. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City, Mo., authorized by an act approved June 17, 1914; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2360. An act to incorporate the American Academy of Engineers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LOCK AND DAM IN MERMENTAU RIVER, LA.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2785) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not call for an appropriation. It does not involve water power. It is simply to get a permit from Congress to authorize the construction of this lock and dam.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is all very interesting, but we can not hear a word that is being said. Will the gentleman from Louisiana come down in front?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2785. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let it be reported first. I do not believe there will be any objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 2785) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, as I said before—

Mr. GARNER. Let us see first if there is unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGER. I.D. Let the bill be reported.

Mr. GILLET. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know how much debate is expected on the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it a war measure?

Mr. LAZARO. Certainly it is a war measure. It is to save the destruction of a great food product.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I suggested that the bill be reported. The Clerk has only read the title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct a lock and dam in the Mermentau River at some suitable point, to be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That said lock and dam shall be constructed and maintained wholly at the expense of said association and in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no toll shall be imposed at any time for the passage of any craft through said lock: And provided further, That the operation and care of said lock and dam, with funds provided by the association, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be assigned to the Engineer officer of the United States Army in charge of the locality.

Sec. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the privilege hereby granted shall be availed of within two years from the date hereof.

Sec. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," insert the words "the consent of Congress is hereby granted."

Page 1, line 5, after the word "Louisiana," strike out the words "be, and is hereby, authorized."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "hereof," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That no dam constructed under the consent hereby granted shall be used to develop water power nor to generate electricity, but the use of the dam by the construction shall be limited to irrigation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to explain this measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks five minutes to explain this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. This bill does not call for an appropriation. It does not involve water power. It is merely a permit from Congress to the people of Louisiana who are engaged in the rice industry to construct this lock and dam in the Mermentau River so that they can save their rice crop next year. We had a long drought this year, and the result was that salt water from the Gulf of Mexico backed up into this Mermentau River and affected 429,315 acres of land which normally would produce, according to the figures of the United States Government, based on the 1916 production, 17,449,224 bushels of rice, the market value of which, at $1.50 a bushel, would be $26,323,836. This is in excess of 50 per cent of the total rice crop of the United States on estimates recently made by the Department of Agriculture. Now, unless we can get this permit from Congress to start this work right now we will lose our next year's crop. As you see by this, we have lost over half of the present crop. I have here a letter from the Secretary of War in which he says:

The Mermentau River is an intrastate stream, and ordinarily the proposed lock and dam might be built in accordance with the provisions of section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, if there were State legislation authorizing it. But there is understood to be no such enabling legislation by the State, and it is impracticable to obtain it as the State legislature is not in session. The need for the structure is urgent, and I am of the opinion that the special authority of Congress is necessary in this case. That is the object of Senate bill No. 2785, to the favorable consideration of which I see no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LAZARO. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is this dam expected to be erected as a permanent structure?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes; for irrigation purposes only.

Mr. SHERLEY. How long have these rice fields been in cultivation?

Mr. LAZARO. A good many years.

Mr. SHERLEY. And they have suddenly discovered the need of this dam?

Mr. LAZARO. Let me say to the gentleman that there was a lock and dam there before, but it was destroyed years ago. Not long ago the Government removed the remainder of the old structure that kept the salt water from backing into the fresh water. Following that we had a drought and the salt water backed into the fresh water and ruined over 50 per cent of the crop of this year. That is all in the letter of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHERLEY. The difficulty with the gentleman's proposal is that he is asking to build a dam across the stream, or asking consideration of a bill authorizing the building of a dam across a navigable stream, under unanimous consent. One of the most controverted matters that has been in Congress for the last several years has been in connection with the building of dams across navigable streams. Without meaning to question the wisdom of this bill, the House is not now in a position to come to any judgment whatever as to the wisdom of a request of this kind.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman permit me to read one of the amendments to the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. I heard the amendments read. There are a good many things in connection with the damming of a navigable stream that are important. It seems to me that the gentleman is asking a good deal of the House to ask it to pass under unanimous consent a bill of this magnitude.

Mr. LAZARO. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will appreciate the situation we are left in. We lost over 50 per cent of this year's crop, and we will only save the next crop by erecting this lock and dam. It is absolutely necessary to get this permission, so that they will be able to construct a lock and dam at their own expense. They are not asking for any appropriation, only for permission so that they can save this next year's crop. I am sure that the gentleman appreciates the importance of saving this great rice crop. We produce more rice in our section of the country than is produced anywhere else, and unless we can get permission to construct this lock and dam it is plain to see that we are going to lose our next crop.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if there were $26,000,000 worth of rice raised on this land the year before the salt water got in.

Mr. LAZARO. I said that we lost that much.

Mr. WALSH. What was the value of the rice crop the year before?

Mr. LAZARO. We lost about 50 per cent of the crop.

Mr. WALSH. I mean before the overflow of the salt water.

Mr. LAZARO. It was double $26,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether it is the intention after this lock and dam is constructed that the United States Government shall maintain it?

Mr. LAZARO. Oh, not at all. The bill says so in plain language—that we are to foot the bills.

Mr. WALSH. Foot the bills for putting it in?

Mr. LAZARO. And for maintaining it afterwards.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The bill says "put in the dam and maintain it."

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. Who is to construct this lock and dam?

Mr. LAZARO. This association.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Composed of the rice planters.

Mr. KEATING. Who will pay for constructing it?

Mr. LAZARO. The Southwest Louisiana Waterway Association.

Mr. KEATING. Is that a concern made up of the farmers of that section?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. It is not a concern organized for profit?

Mr. LAZARO. No; not at all. It is merely to save the rice industry. They are going to construct a dam and maintain it.

Mr. KEATING. How are they to raise the money?

Mr. LAZARO. By voluntary contributions, I imagine.

Mr. KEATING. I may say that I do not want to interfere with the gentleman or his bill, but the gentleman is talking about irrigation, and that is something we are interested in in the West. In our country irrigation companies are mutual concerns owned by the farmers. In the old days irrigation companies were organized for profit and sold the water to the farmers. What I want to get at is whether this is an organization of farmers or an organization for profit.

Mr. LAZARO. It is an organization of farmers, and not an organization for profit.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not for the purpose of irrigating the land, but, as I understand, to prevent the salt water from backing into the fresh water.

Mr. LAZARO. Yes; but when the salt water backs in you can not move a pump, and it stops irrigation. When the salt water backs in the salt water destroys the rice.

Mr. SHERLEY. The building of the dam will not change the method of irrigation, but it will prevent the salt water from interfering with the fresh water?

Mr. LAZARO. From backing into the fresh water.

Mr. SHERLEY. What will this lock and dam cost?

Mr. LAZARO. About $300,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LAZARO, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NOLAN, by unanimous consent, was given indefinite leave of absence, on account of illness.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend the war-risk insurance act, and pending that I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] if we can agree on time for general debate.

Mr. ESCH. I already have requests on file for over three hours. I do not think we ought to make any arrangement today.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can not gentlemen agree that we will conclude general debate to-day?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not think we ought to do that; I do not think we ought to enter into the consideration of the bill on Saturday.

Mr. MADDEN. We ought to have two days' general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, at the request of some Members I ask unanimous consent that the Members who desire to speak on this bill and fail to do so may have 10 legislative days in which to print their remarks.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. Before the Chair puts the question he will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN].

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of House concurrent resolution 16, which is a resolution providing for the opening of certain lands in the Territory of Hawaii to homestead entry. By mistake this resolution was referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Territories. I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Territories and the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and they have agreed the subject matter of this bill should go to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that concurrent resolution 16 be referred to the Committee on Territories. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important bill, and I doubt if many Members have had an opportunity of reading it, and therefore I object. I think the bill should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. I doubt if a more important bill has been presented to this Congress. The reading of it ought to be conducted in such a way as to command the attention of the membership of the House and the membership should listen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that the committee is not in order, and the point is well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"ARTICLE I.

"SECTION 1. That there is established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of war-risk insurance, the director of which shall receive a salary at the rate of $6,000 per annum.

"That there be in such bureau a division of marine and seamen's insurance and a division of military and naval insurance in charge of a commissioner of marine and seamen's insurance and a commissioner of military and naval insurance, respectively, each of whom shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum."

Sec. 2. That such act of September 2, 1914, is hereby amended by adding new sections, as follows:

"Sec. 12. That sections 2 to 9, inclusive, shall be construed to refer only to the division of marine and seamen's insurance.

"Sec. 13. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall administer, execute, and enforce the provisions of this act, and for that purpose have full power and authority to make rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes, and shall decide all questions arising under the act, except as otherwise provided in sections 5 and 405. Wherever under any provision or provisions of the act regulations are directed or authorized to be made, such regulations, unless the context otherwise requires, shall or may be made by the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The director shall adopt reasonable and proper rules to govern the procedure of the divisions, to regulate the matter of the compensation, if any, to be paid to claim agents and attorneys for services in connection with any of the matters provided for in articles 2, 3, and 4, and to regulate and provide for the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence and the method of taking and furnishing the same in order to establish the right to benefits of allowance, allotment, compensation, or insurance provided for in this act, the forms of application of those claiming to be entitled to such benefits, the method of making investigations and medical examinations, and the manner and form of adjudications and awards.

"Sec. 14. That the bureau and its divisions shall have such deputies, assistants, actuaries, clerks, and other employees as may be from time to time provided by Congress. The bureau shall, so far as practicable, by arrangement with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, make use of the services of surgeons in the Army and Navy. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish an advisory board consisting of three members skilled in the practice of insurance against death or disability for the purpose of assisting the division of military and naval insurance in fixing premium rates and in the adjustment of claims for losses under the contracts of insurance provided for in article 4 and in adjusting claims for compensation under article 3; compensation for the persons so appointed to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not to exceed $20 a day each while actually employed.

"Sec. 15. That for the purposes of this act, the director, commissioners, and deputy commissioners shall have power to issue subpoenas for and compel the attendance of witnesses within a radius of 100 miles, to require the production of books, papers, documents, and other evidence, to administer oaths and to examine witnesses upon any matter within the jurisdiction of the bureau. The director may obtain such information and such reports from employees of the departments of the Government of the United States and of the States as may be agreed upon by the heads of the respective departments. In case of disobedience to a subpoena, the bureau may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and such court, within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry is carried on, may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any corporation or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before the bureau, or to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

"Sec. 16. That the director shall submit annually to the Secretary of the Treasury estimates of the appropriations necessary for the work of the bureau.

"Sec. 17. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, for the payment of all expenses incident to the work authorized under this act, including salaries of the director and commissioners and of such deputies, assistants, accountants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, traveling expenses, rent and equipment of offices, typewriters and exchange of same, purchase of law books and books of reference, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and all other necessary expenses. With the exception of the director, the commissioners, and such special experts as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time find necessary for the conduct of the work of the bureau, all employees of the bureau shall be appointed from lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law.

"Sec. 18. That there is hereby appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $141,000,000, to be known as the military and naval family allowance appropriation, for the payment of the family allowances provided by Article II. Payments out of this appropriation shall be made upon and in accordance with awards by the Commissioner of the Division of Military and Naval Insurance.

"Sec. 19. That there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,150,000, to be known as the military and naval compensation appropriation, for the payment of the compensation, funeral expenses, services, and supplies provided by Article III. Payments out of this appropriation shall be made upon and in accordance with awards by the director.

"Sec. 20. That there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $23,000,000, to be known as the military and naval insurance appropriation. All premiums that may be collected for the insurance provided by the provisions of Article IV shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury to the credit of this appropriation.

"Such sum, including all premium payments, is hereby permanently appropriated for the payment of the liabilities of the United States incurred under contracts of insurance made under the provisions of Article IV. Payments from this appropriation shall be made upon and in accordance with awards by the director.

"Sec. 21. That there shall be set aside as a separate fund in the Treasury, to be known as the military and naval pay deposit fund, all sums held out of pay as provided by section 203 of this act. Such fund, including all additions, is hereby permanently appropriated for the payment of the sums so held and deposited, with interest, as provided in section 203, and the amount necessary to pay interest is hereby appropriated.

"Sec. 22. That for the purpose of this act marriage shall be conclusively presumed, in the absence of proof, that there is a legal spouse living, if the man and woman have lived together in the openly acknowledged relation of husband and wife during the two years immediately preceding the date of the declaration of war, or the date of enlistment or of entrance into or employment in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States if subsequent to such declaration, or during the two years immediately preceding the man's death or the beginning of the disability.

"In Articles II, III, and IV of this act unless the context otherwise requires—

"(1) The term 'child' includes—

"(a) A child legally adopted more than six months before the enactment of this amendment or enlistment or entrance into or employment in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States, whichever of these dates is the later.

"(b) A stepchild, if a member of the man's household.

"(c) An illegitimate child, but, as to the father, only if acknowledged by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support.

"(2) The term 'grandchild' means a child as above defined of a child as above defined.

"(3) Except as used in the last sentence of subdivision (g) of section 301 and in section 402 the terms 'child' and 'grandchild' are limited to unmarried persons either under 18 years of age, or if incapable because of mental or physical infirmity of pursuing any substantially gainful occupation, of any age.

"(4) The term 'parent' includes a father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, stepfather, and stepmother, either of the man or of the spouse.

"(5) The terms 'brother' and 'sister' include brothers and sisters of the half blood as well as those of the whole blood, stepbrothers and stepsisters, and brothers and sisters through adoption.

"(6) The term 'commissioned officer' includes a warrant officer, but includes only an officer in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

"(7) The terms 'man' and 'enlisted man' mean a person, whether male or female, and whether enlisted, enrolled, or drafted into active service in the military or naval forces of the United States, and include noncommissioned and petty officers.

"(8) The term 'enlistment' includes voluntary enlistment, draft, and enrollment in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

"(9) The term 'commissioner' means the commissioner of military and naval insurance.

"(10) The term 'injury' includes disease.

"(11) The term 'pay' means the pay for service in the United States according to grade and length of service, excluding all allowances.

"(12) The term 'military or naval forces' means the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Naval Reserves, the National Naval Volunteers, and any other branch of the United States service while serving pursuant to law with the Army or the Navy.

"Sec. 23. That when, by the terms of this act, any payment is to be made to a person mentally incompetent or a minor, such payment shall be made to some suitable person, corporation, or association, as may be prescribed by regulations for the benefit of the person entitled thereto.

"Sec. 24. That the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, so far as practicable, shall furnish information to and act for persons in the military or naval service, with respect to any contracts of insurance, whether with the Government or otherwise, as may be prescribed by regulations.

"Sec. 25. That whoever in any claim for family allowance, compensation, or insurance, or in any document required by this act or by regulation made under this act, makes any statement of a material fact knowing it to be false, shall be guilty of perjury and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

"Sec. 26. That if any person entitled to payment of family allowance or compensation under this act, whose right to such payment under this act ceases upon the happening of any contingency, thereafter fraudulently accepts any such payment, he shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both."

ARTICLE II.

ALLOTMENTS AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES.

Sec. 200. That the provisions of this article shall apply to all enlisted men in the military or naval forces of the United States.

Sec. 201. That allotment of pay shall, subject to the conditions, limitations, and exceptions hereinafter specified, be compulsory as to wife, a former wife divorced and who has not remarried, and a child, and voluntary as to any other person; but on the written consent of the wife, supported by evidence satisfactory to the bureau of her ability to support herself and the children in her custody, the allotment for her and for such children may be waived; and on the enlisted man's application or otherwise for good cause shown, exemption from the allotment may be granted upon such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations.

The monthly compulsory allotment shall be in an amount equal to the family allowance hereinafter specified, except that it shall not be more than one-half the pay, or less than $15; but for a wife living separate and apart under court order or written agreement or for a former wife divorced it shall not exceed the amount specified in the court order or agreement to be paid to her.

If there be an allotment for a wife or child, a former wife divorced shall be entitled to a compulsory allotment only out of the difference, if any, between the allotment for the wife or child, or both, and one-half of the pay.

Sec. 202. That the enlisted man may allot any proportion or proportions or any fixed amount or amounts of his monthly pay or of the proportion thereof remaining after the compulsory allotment, for such purposes and for the benefit of such person or persons as he may direct, subject, however, to such conditions and limitations as may be prescribed under regulations to be made by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively.

Sec. 203. That in case one-half of an enlisted man's monthly pay is not allotted, regulations to be made by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, may require, under such circumstances and conditions as may be prescribed in such regulations, that any proportion of such one-half pay as is not allotted shall be deposited to his credit, to be held during such period of his service as may be prescribed. Such deposits shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, with semiannual rests, and, when payable, shall be paid principal and interest to the enlisted man, if living, otherwise to any beneficiary or beneficiaries he may have designated, or if there be no such beneficiary, then to his next of kin.

Sec. 204. That a family allowance of not exceeding $50 per month shall be granted and paid by the United States upon written application to the bureau by such enlisted man or by or on behalf of any prospective beneficiary, in accordance with and subject to the conditions, limitations, and exceptions hereinafter specified.

The family allowance shall be paid from the time of enlistment to death in or one month after discharge from the service, but not for more than one month after the termination of the present war emergency. No family allowance shall be made for any period preceding the enactment of this amendment. The payment shall be subject to such regulations as may be prescribed relative to cases of desertion and imprisonment and of missing men.

Subject to the conditions, limitations, and exceptions hereinabove and hereinafter specified, the family allowance payable per month shall be as follows:

Class A. In the case of a man, to his wife (including a former wife divorced) and to his child or children:

- (a) If there be a wife but no child, $15.
- (b) If there be a wife and one child, $25.
- (c) If there be a wife and two children, with $5 per month additional for each additional child, $32.50.
- (d) If there be no wife, but one child, $5.
- (e) If there be no wife, but two children, $12.50.
- (f) If there be no wife, but three children, $20.
- (g) If there be no wife, but four children, with $5 per month additional for each additional child, $30.

Class B. In the case of a man or woman to a grandchild, a parent, brother, or sister:

- (a) If there be one parent, $10.
- (b) If there be two parents, $20.
- (c) For each grandchild, brother, sister, and additional parent, $5.

In the case of a woman, to a child or children:

- (d) If there be one child, $5.
- (e) If there be two children, $12.50.
- (f) If there be three children, $20.
- (g) If there be four children, with $5 per month additional for each additional child, $30.

Sec. 205. That family allowances for members of class A shall be paid only if and while a compulsory allotment is made to a member or members of such class. The monthly family allowance to a former wife divorced shall be payable only out of the difference, if any, between the monthly family allowance to the other members of class A and the sum of $50. For a wife living separate and apart under court order or written agreement or to a former wife divorced the monthly allowance, together with the allotment, if any, shall not exceed the amount specified in the court order or agreement to be paid to her.

Sec. 206. That family allowances to members of class B shall be granted only if and while the member is dependent in whole or in part on the enlisted man, and then only if and while the enlisted man makes a monthly allotment of his pay for such member or members equal to the amount of the monthly family allowance as hereinabove specified, except that—

(a) The maximum monthly allotment so required to be made to members of class B shall be one-half of his pay.

(b) If he is making no allotment to a member of class A, the minimum monthly allotment so required to be made to members of class B shall be $15 per month.

(c) If he is making the compulsory allotment to a member of class A, the minimum monthly allotment so required to be made to members of class B shall be one-seventh of his pay, but not less than 5 per month.

(d) On the enlisted man's application, or otherwise for good cause shown, exemption from the allotment as a condition to the allowance may be granted, upon such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations.

Sec. 207. That the amount of the family allowance to members of class B shall be subject to each of the following limitations:

(a) If an allowance is paid to one or more beneficiaries of class A, the total allowance to be paid to the beneficiaries of class B shall not exceed the difference between the allowance paid to the beneficiaries of class A and the sum of $50.

(b) The total monthly allowance to beneficiaries of class B added to the enlisted man's monthly allotment to them shall not exceed the average sum habitually contributed by him to their support monthly during the period of a year immediately preceding his enlistment or the enactment of this amendment.

Sec. 208. That as between a wife, including a former wife divorced, and the children not in her custody, and as between children, the amount of the allotment and family allowance shall be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulations.

Sec. 209. That allotments and family allowances shall be paid to or for the beneficiaries, as may be provided by regulations to be made by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively.

Sec. 210. That upon receipt of any application for family allowance the commissioner shall make all proper investigations and shall make an award, which award shall be certified to the War Department or Navy Department, as may be proper. Whenever the commissioner shall have reason to believe that an allowance has been improperly made or that the conditions have changed, he shall investigate or reinvestigate and may modify the award. The amount of each monthly allotment and allowance shall be determined according to the conditions then existing.

ARTICLE III.

COMPENSATION FOR DEATH OR DISABILITY.

Sec. 300. That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the course of the service, by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 301. That if death results from injury—

If the deceased leaves a widow or child, or if he leaves a widowed mother substantially dependent upon him for support, the monthly compensation shall be the following percentages of his pay:

- (a) For a widow alone, 25 per cent, but not less than $30.
- (b) For a widow and one child, 35 per cent, but not less than $40.
- (c) For a widow and two children, 40 per cent, but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $5, for each additional child up to two.
- (d) If there be no widow, then for one child, 20 per cent, but not less than $15.
- (e) For two children, 30 per cent, but not less than $25.
- (f) For three children, 40 per cent, but not less than $35, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $10, for each additional child up to two.
- (g) For a widowed mother, 20 per cent, but not less than $25.

The amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which, when added to the total amount payable to the widow and children, does not exceed 50 per cent of the pay or $60, whichever is the greater. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if such widowed mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband.

The maximum monthly compensation for death shall be $200.

If the death occurs after discharge or resignation from service, the United States shall pay burial expenses not to exceed $100, as may be fixed by regulations.

The payment of compensation to a widow or widowed mother shall continue until two years after her remarriage or until her death.

The payment of compensation to or for a child shall continue until such child reaches the age of 18 years or marries, or if such child be incapable, because of mental or physical infirmity, of pursuing any substantially gainful occupation, then until marriage or death or until such incapacity ceases.

Whenever the compensation payable to or for the benefit of any person under the provisions of this section is terminated by the happening of the contingency upon which it is limited, the compensation thereafter for the remaining beneficiary or beneficiaries, if any, shall be the amount which would have been payable to them if they had been the sole original beneficiaries.

As between the widow and the children not in her custody, and as between children, the amount of the compensation shall be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulations.

Sec. 302. That if disability results from the injury—

(1) If and while the disability is total so as to make it impracticable for the injured person to pursue any gainful occupation, the monthly compensation shall be the following percentages of his pay:

- (a) If he has neither wife nor child living, 40 per cent, but not less than $40.
- (b) If he has a wife but no child living, 50 per cent, but not less than $55.
- (c) If he has a wife and one child living, 55 per cent, but not less than $65.
- (d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, 60 per cent, but not less than $75.
- (e) If he has no wife but one child living, 50 per cent, but not less than $50, with 5 per cent additional, but not less than $10, for each additional child up to two.
- (f) If he has a widowed mother substantially dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above, 10 per cent, but not less than $10.

To an injured person who is totally disabled and in addition so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $20 per month, as the director may deem reasonable.

The maximum monthly compensation for total disability shall be $200.

(2) If and while the disability is partial, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total disability, equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.

A schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries of a permanent nature shall be adopted and applied by the bureau. Ratings may be as high as 100 per cent. The ratings shall be based, as far as practicable, upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations and not upon the impairment in earning capacity in each individual case, so that there shall be no reduction in the rate of compensation for individual success in overcoming the handicap of a permanent injury. The bureau shall from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with actual experience.

(3) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary.

(4) The amount of each monthly payment shall be determined according to the family conditions then existing.

Sec. 303. That every person applying for or in receipt of compensation for disability under the provisions of this article shall, as frequently and at such times and places as may be reasonably required, submit himself to examination by a medical officer of the United States or by a duly qualified physician designated or approved by the director. He may have a duly qualified physician designated and paid by him present to participate in such examination. For all examinations he shall, in the discretion of the director, be paid his reasonable traveling and other expenses and also loss of wages incurred in order to submit to such examination. If he refuses to submit himself for, or in any way obstructs, any examination, his right to claim compensation under this article shall be suspended until such refusal or obstruction ceases. No compensation shall be payable while such refusal or obstruction continues, and no compensation shall be payable for the intervening period.

Every person in receipt of compensation shall submit to any reasonable medical or surgical treatment furnished by the bureau whenever requested by the bureau; and the consequences of unreasonable refusal to submit to any such treatment shall not be deemed to result from the injury compensated for.

SEC. 304. That if the injured person be deemed competent and not likely to become a public charge, upon his application and evidence satisfactory to the director that it will be for his best interests and for the best interests of his dependents, if any, future compensation payments for disability may be commuted in whole or in part for a lump sum equal to the present value of such payments or the proportion thereof to be commuted, and such lump sum paid to the injured person in lieu of all further compensation or of the proportion so commuted of all future payments of compensation: Provided, however, That in case of partial disability rated at 30 per cent or more of total disability, or in case of total disability, not more than 50 per cent of the compensation payments as for a man without a wife or child shall be so commutable. The basis for determining present values of future payments of compensation shall be prescribed from time to time by regulation.

SEC. 305. That in cases of dismemberment, of injuries to sight or hearing, and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability, the injured person shall follow such course or courses of rehabilitation, reeducation, and vocational training as the United States may provide or procure to be provided. Should such course prevent the injured person from following substantially gainful occupation while taking same, a form of enlistment may be required which shall bring the injured person into the military or naval service. Such enlistment shall entitle the person to full pay as during the last month of his active service, and his family to family allowances and allotment as hereinabove provided, in lieu of all other compensation for the time being.

In case of his willful failure properly to follow such course or so to enlist, payment of compensation shall be suspended until such willful failure ceases and no compensation shall be payable for the intervening period.

SEC. 306. That upon its own motion or upon application the bureau may at any time review an award, and, in accordance with the facts found upon such review, may end, diminish, or increase the compensation previously awarded, or, if compensation has been refused or discontinued, may award compensation.

SEC. 307. That in this article the term "pay" means the monthly pay at the time of the injury, or, in case of disability resulting from disease, at the time of the beginning of such disability, unless at such time he is not in the service of the United States, in which case it shall be taken to refer to the monthly pay at the time of his leaving such service.

SEC. 308. That no compensation shall be payable for death or disability which does not occur prior to or within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, except that where, after a medical examination made pursuant to regulations, at the time of discharge or resignation from the service, or within such reasonable time thereafter, not exceeding one year, as may be allowed by regulations, a certificate has been obtained from the director to the effect that the injured person at the time of his discharge or resignation was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability, compensation shall be payable for death or disability, whenever occurring, proximately resulting from such injury.

SEC. 309. That compensation shall not be payable for death in the course of the service until the death be officially recorded in the department under which he may be serving. No compensation shall be payable for a period during which the man has been reported "missing" and a family allowance has been paid for him, under the provisions of Article II.

SEC. 310. That no compensation shall be payable for death inflicted except by the enemy as a lawful punishment for a crime or military offense. A dismissal or dishonorable or bad conduct discharge from the service shall bar and terminate all right to any compensation under the provisions of this article.

SEC. 311. That no compensation shall be payable unless a claim therefor be filed, in case of disability, within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, or, in case of death in the course of service, within one year after such death is officially recorded in the department under which he may be serving: Provided, however, That where compensation is payable for death or disability occurring after discharge or resignation from the service, claim must be made within one year after such death or the beginning of such disability.

The time herein provided may be extended by the director not to exceed one year for good cause shown. If at the time that any right accrues to any person under the provisions of this article, such person is a minor, or is of unsound mind or physically unable to make a claim, the time herein provided shall not begin to run until such disability ceases or a guardian is appointed of the minor or insane person.

SEC. 312. That no compensation shall be payable for any period more than two years prior to the date of claim therefor, nor shall increased compensation be awarded to revert back more than one year prior to the date of claim therefor.

SEC. 313. That compensation under this article shall not be assignable, and shall be exempt from attachment and execution and from all taxation.

SEC. 314. That compensation under this article shall not be paid while the person is in receipt of service or retirement pay. Existing pension laws and laws providing for gratuities or payment in the event of death in the service shall not be applicable after the enactment of this amendment to persons now in or hereafter entering the military or naval service, except in so far as hereafter under any such law shall have heretofore accrued.

Compensation because of disability or death of members of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) shall be in lieu of any compensation for such disability or death under the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916.

SEC. 315. That if an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this act is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States or the enemy to pay damages therefor, the director, as a condition to payment of compensation by the United States, shall require the beneficiary to assign to the United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability of such other person or any right which he may have to share in any money or other property received in satisfaction of such liability of such other person. The cause of action so assigned to the United States may be prosecuted or compromised by the director and any money realized thereon shall be placed to the credit of the compensation fund.

ARTICLE IV. INSURANCE.

SEC. 400. That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department the opportunity to secure upon equitable terms greater or broader protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in Article III, the United States, upon application to the bureau and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against the death or total disability of any such person in any multiple of $500, and not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, upon the payment of the premiums as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 401. That such insurance must be applied for within 120 days after enlistment or after entrance into or employment in the active service and before discharge or resignation, except that those persons who are in the active war service at the time of the publication of the terms and conditions of such contract of insurance may apply at any time within the 120 days thereafter and while in such service. Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after such publication, becomes or has become totally disabled or dies, or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die before he shall have secured 240 of such installments, the balance of such 240 monthly installments shall be paid, but only if and while there survive him a wife, child, or widowed mother, and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulations.

SEC. 402. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance. The insurance shall not be assignable, and shall not be subject to the claims of creditors of the insured or of the beneficiary. It shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and also during total disability to the injured person, or to any or all of them, and to such other persons as may be provided from time to time by regulations. The insurance shall be payable only in installments. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, for continuous installments during the life of the insured or beneficiaries, or both, for cash, loan, paid-up and extended values, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance. Rights and privileges not provided for may be granted from time to time as may be prescribed by regulations. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries of such insurance without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein or as in the regulations provided.

SEC. 403. That the United States shall bear the expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war. The premium rates shall be the net rates based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

SEC. 404. That during the period of war the insurance shall be term insurance for successive terms of one year each, convertible after war, without medical examination, into such form or forms of insurance, and with such provisions for premium payments as may be prescribed by regulations. Payments of premiums in advance shall not be required for periods of more than one month each and may be deducted from the pay or deposit of the insured or be otherwise made at his election.

SEC. 405. That in the event of disagreement as to a claim under the contract of insurance between the bureau and any beneficiary or beneficiaries thereunder, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States in the district court of the United States in and for the district in which such beneficiaries or any one of them resides. The court, as part of its judgment, shall determine and allow such reasonable attorney's fees, not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount recovered, to be paid by the claimant on behalf of whom such proceedings are instituted to his attorney; and it shall be unlawful for the attorney or for any other person acting as claim agent or otherwise to ask for, contract for, or receive any other compensation because of such action.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I know that every Member of the House and every loyal American in the country has uppermost in his mind but one thing, and that is to end this war successfully and at the earliest possible moment. I believe, as I think every other patriotic citizen of this land believes, that we should do everything here by legislation possible to bring about this end, and bring it about as speedily as possible. We have before us at this time for consideration a bill that I believe will go a great way in many respects toward the accomplishment of this end. I realize, as has been stated here, that this is one of the most important bills that has been presented to this Congress not only during this emergency but for many years past.

I realize my inability also to handle this question as it should be handled and I had hoped that this task—although whatever I can do will be done—would fall to abler and more experienced hands than mine. I want to say to you that when this bill was first introduced, like many Members who have not given it the consideration that some of us have given it, I looked upon many of its provisions with much misgiving. I believed then that a great many amendments should be added to it. I believed then, as many Members have suggested, that those amendments should go into the bill, but after a more thorough study of the bill, and after the comprehensive hearings, both for and against the bill, by some of the ablest men in this country, I have come to the conclusion that this bill should be passed practically in the form in which it was originally written and I trust—

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I would like to lay my premises, but I will allow the gentleman to ask his question.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman stated that able men appeared before his committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman himself wrote a letter.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman if anybody appeared before his committee who had any knowledge of pension matters?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, the gentleman himself, chairman of one of the Pension Committees, wrote a very able letter, and that was incorporated in the hearings. The proposition of pensions was considered from one end of this bill to the other by men—I did not cross-question them to find out just exactly how much they knew about pensions.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Outside of the letter I wrote, was anyone brought before the gentleman's committee in reference to pensions—

Mr. RAYBURN. Everybody who appeared before that committee and asked for a hearing so far as I know got it.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit me to ask another question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. This is, as the gentleman stated, a very important bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. How does it come when you were holding hearings on this bill that men like the Commissioner of Pensions and men who had some knowledge of pension laws were not invited to appear before that committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. If we invited anybody to appear before that committee, it did not come to my knowledge. If the gentleman himself had had this tremendous and wonderful interest in the bill, why did he not suggest to the chairman to ask the Pension Commissioner to appear before that committee?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I naturally took it for granted the chairman of the committee would look after that himself and that it would be discourteous on my part to make such a suggestion.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think if there was a bill before the gentleman's committee and I were interested in it and I thought it was a bad bill and thought a man who knew a great deal about it could defeat that bill by coming before that committee I would not think it was discourteous and I would think I had neglected my duty if I did not ask the committee to give that man a hearing. That is the way I look at this matter entirely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In connection with the question raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], is it not a fact that the Commissioner of Pensions did actually take a stand against this insurance and compensation system?

Mr. RAYBURN. If he did I do not know it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman aware that the Commissioner of Pensions wrote a letter to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce disapproving of this very proposition?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I am not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the question in connection with the inquiries already made, because I have known of such a letter, and thought it might be interesting to have it incorporated in the report or in the hearings.

Mr. RAYBURN. The letter was never called to my attention. I know nothing about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There was such a letter. It was a letter written by the Commissioner of Pensions—a very able and patriotic letter, addressed to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. RAYBURN. What Assistant Secretary of Commerce was that?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Sweet.

Mr. RAYBURN. Even if he got such a letter, he appeared before the committee and very strongly urged the passage of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to confuse the gentleman, and I am not arising in any contentious spirit, but I did read such a letter, and the letter was evidently written before this bill was introduced. The idea of establishing some form of compensation or insurance for soldiers and sailors was abroad. It had been discussed briefly in this House, but following that discussion the Assistant Secretary of the Department of Commerce, Mr. Sweet, did receive a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, disapproving of the general idea, and fearing it would have a very serious effect on the operation of the pension laws.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, we expect this to have a very serious effect on the pension law, because we expect when this bill is enacted into law, and when the people who are on the pension roll now have either died or ceased to draw money under that law, we will not have any pension system.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to say, this bill will supersede the present pension laws?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the intention of the authors of this bill—to have it supersede the present pension laws.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as those who are engaged in the present war are concerned?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it will not, as I understand it, in any way interfere with or abrogate the rights of the pensioners under the existing law?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The survivors of the War of 1812, or of the Civil War, or of the Indian wars will not be affected at all?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I listened to what the gentleman just said about hoping that this would supplant the pension system of the country. But there is not anything in this bill that provides in any way for the abolition of the pension system now in existence or preventing the passage of a law creating a pension system in the future?

Mr. RAYBURN. We could not bind future Congresses, of course. But we say in this bill that this is in lieu of pensions for these men who take advantage of it now, or on whom the advantage is thrust. It is not a question of whether they desire to take advantage of this law or not. All of them who are being taken in the Army now or are going into the Army shall be under this law, whether they want to take advantage of it or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the committee in considering this bill take into account the difficulties that would attend the administration of two pension systems at the same time, covering the survivors of the different wars of the country?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And practically the impossibility of such a conduct?

Mr. RAYBURN. We took into consideration the proposition itself, but we did not come to any conclusion whatever as to any impossibility of it, because there is no such a thing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does not the gentleman from Texas now believe that it will be impossible to continue two pension systems in the United States at the same time?

Mr. RAYBURN. I know that it will not be impossible. I do not only think it, but I know it will not be impossible.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Texas think that the survivors of the War of the Rebellion—the survivors—

Mr. RAYBURN. Say "the Civil War."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. All right. Or put it "the War between the States."

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Or the survivors of the Spanish-American War, will be content with the pensions provided for them while the survivors of the war in Europe are provided with pensions under this system?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know that, and I do not care whether they are or whether they are not. Our object in this bill is to do justice now to the men we are taking into the Army. [Applause.] If the laws that have been passed heretofore are not just, then future Congresses can change them as they see fit. Our object is to try to do what we believe is justice by the people whom we draft into the Army now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not now. Let me tell you something: Did you know there never was in our history an army raised like this army now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; I know.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are going out into the trades and into the fields and into the shops of this country and taking men forcibly from their labor and from their families and putting them into this hazardous employment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I believe that provision for their families should be made and that an insurance provision should be supplied; but what I am talking about now is the purely pension system that is introduced into this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. We call it "compensation," not "pension."

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I understood the gentleman to say that he wanted to do what was right and proper and just for the young men who have been drafted and sent forward so as to fight in this war.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I want to call your attention to this fact, if you are so solicitous as to the welfare of these young men: Under the general law, the law which provides for compensation and for pension for soldiers who were injured in the service in line of duty, if a young man loses both eyes he is now pensioned $100 a month; if a soldier loses both legs he is pensioned $100 a month; if he loses both arms—that is, now, under the existing law—he gets $100 a month. That is the relief he can get. But under your bill you provide only $40 for the same disability.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. We provide it because we think $100 is too much. That is exactly the reason why we provide it. [Applause.] We provide more than you do in some cases because we believe that under the circumstances these drafted men are not getting enough. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is unfair and unjust.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are not afraid to take off the top and put on at the bottom if we find it is unfair and unjust.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If you had a son who had lost both eyes and he came home and could no longer see his loved ones, would you want him to go through this life and not see his family and receive only $40 a month?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, you could not pay a man for the loss of his eyes if you paid him $500 a month, or for the loss of his legs if you paid him $250 a month. But we have struck what we believe to be a pretty happy average. If this young man is totally disabled and has no one to take care of him, he is allowed $20 a month with which to hire a nurse to take care of him in addition to the $40 a month. We think that is fairly liberal.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to call attention to this fact: I understand the bill makes the family the unit, and not the individual, and if that soldier has a family, he and the family are more liberally provided for than he is separately.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; of course, and it ought to be so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If my colleague will yield, I take the liberty of asking that the committee permit him to proceed without interruption until he has made a reasonable explanation of the bill. It is manifestly unjust to him that he be interrupted with concrete questions at every turn.

The CHAIRMAN. It is entirely within the province of the gentleman from Texas, who has the floor, to say whether he will consent to yield or not.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will concede that I may be a sort of apprentice here, but I do not desire to yield further. I think I know the provisions of this bill, and if these gentlemen by their questions and speeches can show that the House ought not to pass it, they ought to be able to show it.

Mr. SNOOK. I call my colleague's attention to the fact that under this law provision is made for the rehabilitation of the man—his education—and provision is made to put him into some calling in life that may be worth to him more than $100 a month.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I would have explained that if I had been allowed to go along and speak at least a minute and a half without interruption. [Laughter.] But I do not object to it. I will not absolutely refuse to yield, but I think we will get more satisfactory results if I am allowed to proceed.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it the purpose of the bill to entirely displace, so far as concerns those who are engaged in this war, the present Pension Bureau permanently or only temporarily?

Mr. RAYBURN. Permanently.

Mr. BURNETT. Then you will have one pension board administering the older laws and another administering this law?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly the truth about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That will provide for additional deserving Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so, because I do not think you folks will have a chance to administer it soon. [Laughter.]

But that is aside from this question. This is a nonpartisan question, as is the question of pensions, you know. They are nonpartisan, and this applies to everybody.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. You propose to establish a new pension bureau practically. What is the reason for that? Why not have this law administered by the organization of the present Pension Bureau?

Mr. RAYBURN. I had hoped to come to that when I reached article 3 of this bill, but I had not begun on article 1 before I was interrupted. I have become convinced, as I say, that this bill ought to be passed practically in its present form, and furthermore that it should be passed as speedily as possible. As we know—and we might as well be honest with ourselves—there is not such enthusiasm in this country for this war as some of us think there ought to be, and as we know there ought to be. We know that the people from one end of this land to the other—a small percentage, of course—are going about scattering the seeds of dissension and disloyalty, and one of the main things that they have to plead is that under the system as it is now administered those people who have been dependent upon a man who is called into the service will suffer while he is away.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. We are not taking anybody into the service who has dependents at all. We are exempting them.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, we are taking them. I know we are.

Mr. PLATT. Occasionally we are; some one in the Aviation Service, or somewhere else, with a commission.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no; every day we are taking them in.

Mr. PLATT. No; every one of them is exempted.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are taking them in—men who have not enough to sustain their families. The gentleman knows we are taking men into the service who have not enough to maintain their families in the way that they should sustain them. If the gentleman does not know that, he ought to know that.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know what the gentleman means. We are taking in some rich men who have wives and families, who possibly will suffer some, if that is what the gentleman means.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, I do not mean any such thing as that.

As I was saying, when I get through with article 1, then I will take up article 2; and then I hope to take up article 3, and then article 4, and when I have finished my statement as to each article, I shall invite questions, because, to tell you the truth about it, they help me very much. One of the main things that they are saying in this country, as I started to say, is that there is many a mother who feels that she is dependent upon the labor of her son for sustenance, and many a wife who feels that she is dependent upon her husband's wages for sustenance, and these men are being taken into this war. In a home like that there is not much enthusiasm for this war, and we can not blame them. But under article 2 of this bill we provide what we believe will be a fair amount to take care of those who have been dependent upon the man who has been drafted into the service.

Last spring Congress was very generous in voting to the soldier $30 per month, with 10 per cent additional for foreign service, which makes him $33 a month when he is called into foreign service. We know, because we have consulted military experts, that $33 a month for a private soldier to spend is too much money, and I have authority to use the name of our great leader who is now in France in saying that he says that is too much not only for the morale of his own Army but for the morale of the French Army; because if there is any place upon this earth where democracy should reign supreme it is in the trenches on the battle front in France and other places where we are fighting.

Gen. Pershing says that a soldier with more than $10 a month for spending money has too much spending money for keeping up the morale of the Army. We therefore provide in section 1 of this bill that the private soldier shall send back to his family at least $15 of his pay. Of course, he would have to send back $16.50 when in foreign service. That would leave the man in foreign service with $16.50 spending money; and do you know that if he has $16.50 of spending money he will have more than twice as much as the average soldier fighting in the allied armies of the world to-day has.

It is said that $15 a month will not provide very much for a wife, and perhaps there will be children; but when the soldier himself puts up $15 a month, we say that the Government, if he have a wife, shall put up $15 a month also. That makes $30 a month, and that will keep the wolf from the door of most people in this country. Of course, it will not maintain them in luxury, but we must all make sacrifices during this war.

We provide further that if he have a child an additional amount is given. If he have two children, an additional amount, and if he have three children an additional amount, up to $50, that the Government will pay to the family of the man if he have a wife and more than four children. With the man's own allotment, that means that the family of a man with five children will receive $65 a month. Upon an average a woman can get along fairly well on $65 a month. Of course, in the great cities of this country, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and other places like that, where living is different, it will be hard for them to get along on that. In some country districts away out there where they have their gardens, their chickens, and their cows, living at home, $65 will be very ample but we could not say that in one section of the country the soldier's allowance should be one thing and in another section of the country it should be another thing.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this apply to officers also or simply to privates?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not to commissioned officers. It is for the enlisted men and noncommissioned officers.

Mr. MADDEN. A further question. The compensation of a first sergeant, including—

Mr. RAYBURN. We are on the allowance now, not the compensation.

Mr. MADDEN. The compensation of a first sergeant, including his clothing and his allowances for food, amounts to about $105 a month or more. It amounts to more than the compensation of a second lieutenant.

Mr. RAYBURN. I can not keep these figures in my head. I will accept whatever the gentleman says.

Mr. MADDEN. It would amount to more than the pay of a second lieutenant.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; a second lieutenant receives $1,700 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. But a second lieutenant has to pay for all his equipment, food and all that, and a first sergeant really gets more than a second lieutenant. Now, if this does not apply to a commissioned officer as high in rank as a second lieutenant, then the family of a second lieutenant is not being treated as well as the family of a first sergeant.

Mr. RAYBURN. A second lieutenant gets how much?

Mr. MADDEN. He gets $1,700 a year, but he has to pay for his own clothing, equipment, food, and everything himself.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not able to go into the technical discussion of these matters.

Mr. MADDEN. I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the fact that treating a second lieutenant as a commissioned officer and not giving him and his family the same opportunities as are given to the families of men who are not commissioned is, it seems to me, doing an injustice to those men in the service.

Mr. RAYBURN. It appears to me that a man who is getting $150 a month ought to take care of himself and be able to send home more than $65 a month to his family.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, Members, of course, appreciate the spirit of courtesy that prompts my colleague to yield to questions that are asked him, but there are some of us who would like a consecutive presentation of this bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman not to yield until he gets through with his presentation. We can not get a coherent idea of the bill unless he does that.

Mr. RAYBURN. I could do that in fairness to myself and to the House if this bill were not really divided into four bills. I am now on the second article; that is, the allotment provision.

Mr. HARDY. We who wish to understand the bill can not get it when there are so many interruptions. I know gentlemen can reserve their questions, and I would like to have the gentleman go through and explain the bill without interruption.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would like to do that, but I can not refuse to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire about section 202, with which article 2 begins, "Providing that the provisions of this article shall apply to all enlisted men in the military or naval forces of the United States." As article 2 applies only to "allotments and family allowances," I ask the gentleman to hold that in mind and turn to article 3, "Compensation for death or disability," which provides "for death or disability resulting from personal injury, and so forth, contracted in the course of the service in the line of duty for any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps," and so forth. Will the gentleman explain why this differentiation between the enlisted man and the commissioned officer?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman ought to know that commissioned officers are as likely to get killed as an enlisted man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be; but apparently the commissioned officer is not included in the allotment of family allowances.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; because they do not need it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the explanation. It would appear from a casual reading of the bill that the enlisted man is picked out for a special kind of treatment.

Mr. RAYBURN. I see the gentleman's point; but it must be clear to the gentleman now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The officer participates in the compensation for death or disability, and the enlisted man also participates; but the officer apparently does not participate in the allotment for family allowances.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; and we do not think he needs it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The officer is a higher salaried man. That is the argument?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I was trying to discuss article 2 of the bill, with reference to allowances, and I had reached the point where I had given the figures that the average family could get.

There is another provision in the article about which there has been some contention, and I am frank to say that I had the same trouble with it when we began the consideration of the bill. That is, that some of the men in this war have no dependents. Take a young fellow not married, whose parents are both alive, where the father can provide for the mother, and that young man is not forced to contribute anything to anyone's support because there is no dependent on him. Now, going back to what I said about $33 being too much for a private individual in order to have the democracy in the Army, in order to have him stand alongside of the allies without creating the impression that he is an overpaid man. Further than that, let me call the attention of this House to the fact that our soldiers in France have already done a very serious injustice not only to us but to the soldiers and people of France. They have gone over there with their pockets bulging with money and have spent it freely. They have absolutely inflated prices in certain sections of France in which they are quartered until it is a hard matter for poor people there to get along.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. Did not Gen. Pershing recommend that they should not have more than $10 a month spending money?

Mr. RAYBURN. I stated that a few moments ago. Now, we provide in article 2 that where a man has no dependent, under regulations by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy this man may be compelled to deposit at least one-half of his pay, and a fund is created to pay him 4 per cent interest, and it may be paid semiannually on that amount. Of course, we may say that that is taking away from a man the liberty of doing with his money what he pleases. We know, of course, that a man in France has no opportunity to invest the money that he might save. He would spend the money for first one thing and then another, and demoralize not only the army with which he is associated but the people around that army, and we provide that he shall send back, and that it shall be left here on deposit, at least one-half of his wages, and this money can be drawn out when the emergency is over.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the Government has any right to take away the right of the soldier to make what disposition he pleases of his own money?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I do. I do not think there is any question about that. We have already provided in other cases that he shall send back one-half of his wages.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but that is because he has dependents who must be cared for; but this man that I am speaking of has no dependents.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are taking care of him, too. The gentleman asks whether we have the right and power to do that, and I think there is no question about it.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the gentleman, and I think the higher pay has made some trouble in the camps in this country. The bill does not say that the $15 a month shall be withdrawn; it says "may be." Ought not that to be made compulsory?

Mr. RAYBURN. Probably it ought to be made compulsory. Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some one wants to ask a question I will pass to article 3.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Suppose a soldier has financial obligations which he leaves here at home, can not he arrange to meet them by monthly payments out of his pay?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am certain discretion is left with the board so that he can apply the money in that way.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from Texas has made some very serious charges against the troops in France. Could the gentleman give us further details of the manner in which they have demoralized things?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I do not know, and I would not if I knew.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Their pay is a little over a dollar a day; and of course they are found, fed, housed, clothed, and cared for. It seems to me that a dollar a day is not a very extravagant sum for spending money, and I believe that the bill does not provide that they shall not spend their own money.

This is a selective draft, I believe, in theory and in practice, but there are many enlisted men or drafted men who could spend $5 a day or $10 a day. Is there any proposition to police their expenditures?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; there is not.

Mr. CANNON. I mean from the standpoint of their being corrupted or corrupting our allies?

Mr. RAYBURN. I feel absolutely certain, however, that the average man from 21 to 31 who is drafted into the Army, and of course we have to go on averages, will not have a great deal of money outside of his salary, and I do not think they would draw for it; but there is no prohibition of a man who has money in the bank from drawing out and spending it that I know of. I do not know whether it would be wise—

Mr. CANNON. One of the reasons assigned for the draft was that it would take the son of the plutocrat as well as the son of the laborer, and I presume it has.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes, sir; I presume it has, but I do not know whether it would be wise to try to regulate that or not. We do not in this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to call attention to section 201 that provides an allotment that shall be compulsory as to the wife and former wife divorced, and I want to know—

Mr. RAYBURN. And not remarried.

Mr. HASTINGS. And not remarried. Why should he make an allotment to his divorced wife who has no children—

Mr. RAYBURN. No; that he is in the habit of contributing to her support, yes.

Mr. SIMS. Or by a decree of court.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand it now.

Mr. RAYBURN. Or who has been doing it under decree of court.

Mr. HASTINGS. I find it now further down in the second paragraph of the bill, but it was not clear in the beginning of section 201.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. SWITZER. Before the gentleman finishes on this article I would like to hear the reasons for taking away from the War Department the administration of this allotment. Why should not that be administered by the War Department?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are amending the war-risk insurance bill. That, of course, is handled in the Treasury Department; and I might just as well state now, and should probably have stated it before, that a question of jurisdiction has been raised here about committees, and some committees are pretty raw about it. This bill has gone to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Some people say it ought to have gone to the Committee on Pensions; others say part of it ought to have gone to the Committee on Naval Affairs; others say part of it ought to have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. This bill is an amendment to the war-risk insurance bill we passed in 1914, I believe. That bill came to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce because it dealt with commerce. Of course we do not contend that the lives of these men and this, that, and the other is commerce; but this bill is an amendment to that war-risk insurance bill. The War-Risk Insurance Bureau is in the Treasury Department and has been all the time it has been administered through the Treasury Department. This being an amendment to it, we put it in the Treasury Department also.

Mr. SWITZER. Why should it not have been allowed to remain in the War Department and Navy Department? What is the necessity of creating a new bureau?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are not creating a new bureau. I just tried to explain that this bureau is already in operation in the Treasury Department. We create a director, one who serves under the head of the department down there now.

Mr. SWITZER. The administration came under the War Department during the border trouble, and we provided a large amount, which was expended—

Mr. RAYBURN. Not that I know of.

Mr. SWITZER. And there has been no criticism of its handling. Every man is under their control, and they easily can find out if he is married and when married and know all about his services.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course these records are as available to one department as to another.

Mr. SWITZER. But they do not have to be transmitted from one department of the Government to another.

Mr. RAYBURN. They are as available to one department as another. All they have to do is to carry them across the hall. Now, article 2 contains the provisions with reference to allowances that are to be made and the allotments to be made to families and by the Government to families. Article 3, of course, is one of the articles in the bill that is going to be contested by people who believe in other forms of paying men, the families of men who are killed, and the man himself and his family, who is either disabled or partially disabled. I do not think the pension laws of this country have ever operated to the satisfaction of the people as they should.

I do not believe that men who fight for us and who lose their limbs and who are disabled or partially disabled, or the families of those men who have lost their lives in defense of our liberties, we say, should be placed in the attitude of having straight-out gratuities from the Government, or that those things should be passed around on political favor like we have in the past. I know, sir, that unless we do something now, after this war is over that another saturnalia of pension frauds and pension claims will be put up to this Congress. I want to do what I can here to do justice to the families of the men who are killed, justice to the men who are disabled, either totally or partially, during this war and have an end to it. They say that it matters not if we pass this provision in this bill these pension claims will come up after the war. We can not, of course, as I said a moment ago, bind a future Congress. We can not tell what they will do; but we can place a moral obligation upon each man who goes out to battle in this war; we can place a moral obligation upon each Member of Congress under the provisions of this law we pass, which is generous in the extreme to these men, not to do those things after this war shall have closed.

And that is as far as we can go. That is as far as we want to go. And we hope it will be sufficient after the war is over.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. You say you are going to try to put a stop to this practice. What is your object in referring all these matters to a new bureau? Why create this new bureau? Can the gentleman tell me?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are not creating a new bureau. We are extending one that we have already created.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. All the pension laws now are adjudicated in the Bureau of Pensions under the Interior Department. Now, why create a new bureau?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are not going to have pensions under this bureau.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. My dear friend, you can call it compensation, if you like; but when you provide for a certain stipulated amount of money to be paid in monthly installments to the man that is injured, it is nothing more nor less than a pension.

Mr. RAYBURN. What is the gentleman kicking about?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why do you want to put this country to the extra expense of adjudicating these matters in another department?

Mr. RAYBURN. If this is more generous than before, why are you kicking?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why put the Government to the additional expense of adjudicating these claims and creating a new bureau? We have a pension bureau that has been running nearly 100 years. I have never heard a complaint about it except by those who have not been able to get their claims through. We have able men there.

Mr. RAYBURN. We have a trained force on the floor of this House, too. You can go over to the Congressional Library and take the reports of the special bills that have passed through this Congress, and practically every one will read like an adverse report until you get down to the recommendation, and then they say, "We recommend that this bill be passed."

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Let me say this to the gentleman. I saw a letter recently, and I think it was written by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the inference was that this legislation would do away with special acts. Now, let me impress upon your mind that this legislation is going to do no such thing, but is going to operate just the reverse. Now, let me point out to you a concrete case. In the last days of the last session Maj. Gen. Funston died in line of duty—just a day or two before Congress adjourned. Some Member from his home State introduced a bill—I do not recall who it was—and that special act was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The committee recommended the maximum rate under their rule of $50 a month. It came to the House, and the House passed it. It went to the Senate and the Senate increased it to $1,000 a year, or, perhaps, it was $100 a month. I rather think it was $1,200 a year. It came back to the House, and after considerable jangling the House passed the bill. Now, let me remind the gentleman that under the provisions of this bill, if you pass it as reported by the committee, you are going to pension the widows of major generals at $2,000 and probably $2,400 a year. That is what you are going to do.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Now, wait just a moment. Will not the soldiers' widows in your district come in here and ask to be put on the same basis? Let me point this out to you: Under the provisions of this bill—

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to tell the gentleman that the widows of my district will not get their bills introduced like the bills are introduced now.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Then you are an exception.

Mr. RAYBURN. And we are generous enough in this. A widow can get as much as $2,400 a year, and that is one reason why—

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I do not want to get off my line—

Mr. RAYBURN. You are getting me off of mine.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is all right. I want to make this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Under the provisions of existing law, the general law, where a soldier dies from disability occurring in the service, the widow of a Civil War veteran gets $20 a month.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, I am not going to yield any further. If you want to ask me a question I will answer it. Somebody will give the gentleman plenty of time to make his 20 or 30 minute speech later on.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. And a widow whose husband was killed at Santiago or in the Philippines receives $12 a month. But you provide for the young widow in this bill, one who is strong and able to earn her own living, not less than $30 a month, and if she has children, as high as $45 or $55 a month.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not deny that. I said that in the beginning.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. These other widows lost their husbands in the line of duty—

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not pass the present pension bill under which you are operating and which you are advocating.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why should the Spanish War soldier's widow only get $12 and a widow under this bill $30? Do you call that fair and just?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not going to yield any further, because the gentleman is making a speech. I answered the question awhile ago, to the effect that I did not write the pension laws which are on the statute books to-day. We are writing a law to-day for these drafted men and their families that is just to-day and are not going back and rehashing this pension law that has been on the statute books a hundred years.

Mr. GILLETTE. Will the gentleman yield? I do not wish to interrupt him unless he is willing.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I will yield for a question, of course.

Mr. GILLETTE. It is a question, and it is sincerely for information.

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not say I thought it would be otherwise.

Mr. GILLETTE. Following what has been suggested, I wonder if it would not be inevitable that if we passed this bill as it is now proposed and then create in the country some disabled men in this war who are getting one rate of pension and some disabled men of previous wars who are getting another rate of pension, or a class of widows of this war who would get one rate of pension and another class belonging to other wars getting a different rate—would it not be inevitable that in the future the two rates would be made equal, and inevitably also not only would they be made equal, but the man who was receiving the lower rate, whichever it happened to be, would be raised to the level of the one who was getting the higher rate, and the same with respect to the widow?

Mr. RAYBURN. I would not be candid with the gentleman if I did not answer him in the affirmative; I would not be. I am not talking about the justice of $12 a month for the widow or $2 for the child of a former war. I am talking about what I believe is just to the families of these drafted men that you have forcibly taken away from their wives and families. If it is developed and I shall be convinced that it is just to pay these Civil War widows $30 a month, I would vote for it, and I would not be candid with the gentleman if I did not say that inevitably this will not come down or that will not go up.

Mr. MADDEN. This does not apply alone to drafted men?

Mr. RAYBURN. It applies to the Army. Nearly all are drafted.

Mr. SIMS. The compensation in this bill applies only to those who are injured in the service, and men who are receiving a service pension can not ever be put on a parallel with them, and this should not be a reason why the service pension should be increased.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Massachusetts evidently thinks otherwise.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course I did not mean a service pension.

Mr. GILLETTE. I did not raise the question of the service pension.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is no service compensation in this. This is only for death or partial disability.

Mr. SIMS. This compensation that widows are now getting comes from service pensions.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know anything about pensions, and God forbid that I ever should. That is the reason why I want to pass this bill so much and get away from the pension system if we can.

Now, unless somebody wants to ask me a question as to article 3, I will pass on from it.

Mr. McKEOWN. What is the reason why the compensation of the widow of an officer is higher than the compensation of the widow of a private?

Mr. RAYBURN. It has always been so. There has never been a question about a thing like that. It is just like trying to equalize men. You can not equalize them. They do not earn the same in civil life. Therefore you pay the officer more than the private, although the private is putting in just as much of his time fighting as the officer himself, and sometimes more.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. In regard to the question just asked you by the gentleman on the other side, I will say that all the compensation laws are based on the average earnings of the workmen.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And the officer's compensation is greater than that of the private, and the pension is in no greater proportion.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Now, there is compensation here for a single man who is totally disabled. It is $40 a month. If he is in need of a nurse, if he is in need of the constant care of somebody, $20 additional is added, making $60 for his part. If he is killed, his widow gets $30 a month, with an increase for each child that he has. If a man is totally disabled and he lives, he and his family may get $75 a month compensation, according to the number of children that he has. If he has a mother dependent upon him, $10 may be added to that. If he also is in need of nursing, and it can be shown to the bureau that he needs the constant care of a nurse, $20 a month is added to that.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose the soldier's widow has remarried. Is any provision made against that?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and we also provide that the marriage must be contracted before the injury.

Mr. MADDEN. If the widow remarries after the death of her husband, then what?

Mr. RAYBURN. We provide for her until her death or her remarriage. The gentleman will find that on line 20 of page 18.

Mr. MADDEN. What provision is made for the children after her marriage?

Mr. RAYBURN. If the bill is not clear on that, I will introduce an amendment to take care of the children.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not clear.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not clear; and I hope to offer an amendment to provide for the children.

Mr. MADDEN. There ought to be some means by which those children would be supplied with a guardian if the mother remarried again and is not the proper person to take care of them.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that should be done. If it can be shown that she or her second husband is not the proper person to take care of the children, the courts can be called upon.

Mr. WALSH. Does the law set forth the rate of compensation for different classes of disability or injury?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. WALSH. Who makes up that?

Mr. RAYBURN. The law allows that to be determined. For total disability it is $40, for 75 per cent disability it is $30, and so on down.

Mr. WALSH. Who decides as to that?

Mr. RAYBURN. That must be left to the bureau created under this bill.

Mr. WALSH. That is, to some bureau under the Treasury Department?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; a bureau under the Treasury Department.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that in the present pension laws the various degrees of disability are part of the laws?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think so, although I may be mistaken. I do not think they are all defined. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] to answer as to that.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; specific rates are all set out. You will find that from the hearings. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman this question—

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think they cover all disabilities. I am under the impression that they do not. I think the gentleman must be mistaken about that. But the gentleman can go ahead and ask his question. We can straighten that out later.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Under the provisions of your bill if the soldier fails to make application for a pension within two years from the time of his discharge—

Mr. RAYBURN. This is not pension; this is compensation.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Let us call it "compensation" in order to avoid the necessity of argument.

Mr. RAYBURN. All right.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If he fails to make application for this compensation within two years from the time of his discharge, are not the doors shut, and he is disbarred from getting compensation?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman this further question: If that is true, what was the object when the committee made that recommendation? What was the object in putting that in there? Let me ask this question: Suppose a soldier was in the service, and he lost an eye in the service, and he failed to make an application within two years after the time of his discharge. There would always be a record—a military record—of that fact in the War Department, to the effect that the soldier lost an eye or received a wound in the service.

Why should the door be shut against that soldier? Why should you say that unless he makes an application within a certain time—within two years—he is forever barred from a pension?

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman say that he shall forever have the privilege of coming in and making an affidavit?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I say yes; as long as the Government has the record of that disability; so long as there is a record of that on file in the War Department.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman is basing his statement entirely on a false pretense. If that man has an eye out, he will get the compensation.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Not unless he makes application.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman may be sure of that; but—

Mr. KEY of Ohio. There are cases where they have not made application for years afterwards.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and some of them lost eyes after being mustered out of the service.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will permit, it is true that under the present pension laws men may wait 10 or 12 or 15 years and then get a Congressman to introduce a bill to pension him for alleged injuries incurred in the service; but when you get down to the evidence before the Pension Committee you will sometimes find that the disability originated from a disease such as a syphilis or gonorrhea. That is how it sometimes turns out.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. A great many men would be in such circumstances that they would not need to apply for pensions, and there have been many such men who did not; and then they have lost their money and, after meeting with misfortune, they have applied and have received them.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why should not the statute of limitations run against men who do not apply?

Mr. PLATT. Because, if a man does not apply until he needs the pension, but the time comes later when he does need it, it would be a great injustice to him to shut him out under a statute of limitation.

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that it might be wise to leave the time limit out of the bill, because there might be a good many men who would not care to make application, and of course the longer they remained without making the application the more the Government would save, and it would not do any harm, anyway.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true. That is a question of detail that I think might well be worked out.

Mr. SNOOK. I want to confirm the information my colleague had as to the question of the rates of pensions. I am referring now to the letter in the appendix, written by the gentleman from Ohio. At the top, where the rates are set out, he says these are the rates fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions for certain disabilities, and then quotes from the law, which shows that the rates are not fixed in the law.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is my impression, and I think the gentleman was mistaken. The gentleman from Ohio is so enthused over pensions that he can not think but that that law is perfect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill makes no provision whatever for soldiers' homes or for homes for their orphans and widows, does it?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; we hope to keep them out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the intent of the committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it expected to dispense altogether with the homes that are now provided for soldiers?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know what you are going to do with those homes, but we hope to keep these people out, and we think we have been generous enough with them so that they will not need these homes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then if the beneficiary of any one of these particular funds runs out of money and has no home of his own to go to, there will be no home open to him under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. There is no home closed to him under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I presume we would still have with us the question of finding a place for him, whether he was a veteran of the present war or of a preceding war?

Mr. RAYBURN. I presume so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the present homes will continue to exist under the existing law.

Mr. RAYBURN. That will depend on what Congress does about it. There is nothing in this bill to open the door of a soldiers' home or to close it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as this bill is concerned, it intends to dispense with the soldiers' homes and the homes for their widows and orphans.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I do not agree to that. I will not let the gentleman put me in that position.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not mean to put the gentleman in any false position.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would not say that. It is not true. This bill does nothing about it either way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the question is, What will become of a beneficiary of this law after his own funds have run out and he is unable to care for himself; that is to say, the funds he derives from this benefit?

Mr. RAYBURN. The benefit never will run out, nor does this fund run out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take it that if a pensioner now on the roll becomes so unfortunate that he can not maintain himself upon his pension he has a home provided by the Government to which he can go. That is the fact. Now, I am asking whether, if under this proposed system he becomes so unfortunate as not to have sufficient to maintain himself when he is old and enfeebled, the Government will still provide him with the opportunity of obtaining a home?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know about that, but I know that if he ever comes under this compensation law, if he has lost a leg, if he has lost an arm, if he has lost an eye, if he has lost both legs, both arms or anything like that it matters not what occupation he goes into we can not restore his legs or his arms or his eyes, and if he gets to making a thousand dollars a month we are not going to take away from him the Government compensation, and if he goes into a Government home we are not going to take his compensation away from him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that is done now under certain circumstances.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not going to be done under this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to know whether we were going to dispense with the homes altogether under this law.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are not touching that subject in this law.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The question of what will become of the soldier, and when the benefit will cease, depends on when this Government will end, and the Government will end—

When wrapt in flames the realms of ether glow
And heaven's last thunders shake the world below.

[Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman that the provision of law admitting soldiers to these homes is not a part of the pension law.

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. And therefore it is not affected either by the pension law or by this law.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is a rehabilitation and a reeducation provision here; and if the Government reeducates him and rehabilitates him, and he gets so that he can make money, it matters not how much he makes, he has lost his eyes or his arms or his legs, and we are not going to take away from him compensation under this law. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman admits my proposition he gives the soldier a double chance, the chance of compensation and the chance of a home.

Mr. RAYBURN. If a soldier goes over to France and fights for your rights and your people's rights and gets his arm shot off or his leg shot off or his eyes shot out, I am willing to give him a pretty good chance when he comes back.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. He can not be more sympathetic than I am.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. This compensation, so called—

Mr. RAYBURN. It is compensation; not so called.

Mr. STEENERSON. Whatever you call it, it relates simply to disabilities incurred in the line of duty. In an army of perhaps 2,000,000 men there would be, of course, a great many who would perhaps be totally disabled who would be unable to show that their disability was incurred in the line of duty, and they would be destitute. Now, there is nothing in this act to take care of them in any manner whatever. Does not the gentleman think that they should be properly subject to a special pension legislation?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I do not.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman would leave them out entirely?

Mr. RAYBURN. Where is the man to get hurt not in the line of service that he ought to be paid for? I will say that I am in favor of striking out that line that the committee has put in and leaving it in the line of service. The bill was originally written with that out. The argument I hope to make when that comes up under the five-minute rule is that a man in the trenches fighting ought to have a leave. If he goes to Paris or some place and gets hurt, not from his own willful misconduct, I do not see any use in cutting him off.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then the gentleman would favor that change?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have so stated.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the limitation of two years was not put into the bill because it was framed on the theory that this was an insurance policy, or similar to an accident insurance policy?

Mr. RAYBURN. Probably it was, and probably it was put in for protection for something else.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman who framed the bill had the idea that he was framing a law analogous to an insurance law and trying to comply with the conditions of a policy.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are trying to comply with the best thought along the line of compensation.

Mr. STEENERSON. Another suggestion came to my mind when the gentleman argued that this was not a new bureau. It seems to me, reading the bill as far as I have, that about 99 per cent of it is new.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will be perfectly candid with the gentleman. If it is a new bureau I am for it; and if he calls it an old bureau extended, or a new bureau, I am for it.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman admits that the Bureau of Pensions has jurisdiction of 99 per cent of the subject of this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not admit anything of the kind, and it is never going to have any jurisdiction over it.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. If the change was made as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, striking out that the injury or disease must occur in the line of duty and throwing it open to diseases and injuries occurring during service, would not it have to be safeguarded by a provision that the disease or injury should not have resulted from the man's infraction of the law or his own misconduct?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes, certainly; and there is a provision in here, or in the amendment that I am going to offer, that it shall not be on account of the willful misconduct of the soldier.

Mr. BORLAND. That the injury should not result from any such occurrence as happened at Houston.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course; and I said that a moment ago.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but I may send this speech out and I do not want to advertise the gentleman down in Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Under the provisions of your bill I notice that where a soldier receives total disability, say the loss of both eyes or both arms or both legs, that you give him $40 a month and $20 nurse hire. Then, for partial disabilities, the loss of one arm, one leg, or one eye, the adjudication of that is to be left to the discretion of the Treasury Department. Is that right?

Mr. RAYBURN. Where is it left now? In your law you provide that it shall be left to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. You provide a special rate for total disability, but not for a partial disability.

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. You cut down the rate from the existing law for disability from $100 to $40, and if there is a disposition to cut down the total disability to $40 from the law, as the Bureau of Pensions has it, what will it do with the partial disabilities—give them a mere pittance?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; we have provided that it shall be settled on a percentage, and let me say that the $40 applies only to the single man.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The total disability is cut down two-thirds, and if you cut the special rate for total disability down two-thirds, what are you going to do with the other?

Mr. RAYBURN. If his injury is slight, it ought to be cut down.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. For the loss of one arm or one leg or one eye, what would you call that? Fifty per cent?

Mr. RAYBURN. Perhaps 50 per cent, but that is a matter of administration.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I wonder how far it would go.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know how far it would go.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In reference to total disability where the rate seems to be rather low, is not there a provision somewhere in the bill that the person totally disabled will be rehabilitated and reeducated?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And that will be done at the expense of the Government.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; the only thing required of him, whether he is partially disabled or totally disabled, is that he shall report when they ask him to report. If he does not do it his compensation is canceled.

Mr. FESS. And would not that amount to an additional allowance?

Mr. RAYBURN. I should think so.

Mr. FESS. As far as that feature is concerned, let me say that I think it is one of the most important things that could be done.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is true.

Mr. FESS. What about the rehabilitation and reeducation—is that under the control of the Treasury Department?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is wholly under the control of the Treasury Department.

Mr. FESS. That is left to the bureau?

Mr. RAYBURN. Left to the department entirely. I presume they would call experts on things like that when this power is granted to them.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that I think that particular feature will be one of the most important features in all respects in the bill. I wondered whether both the military and civil authority was recognized in its administration, and it is a matter which in my mind was rather cloudy.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, it is not specifically set out here except it shall be under the general regulation of this bill. Of course, it will be a question. I think when this war is over, of course, other legislation will be enacted to cover it wherever needed. Now, I have been up about an hour and a half and I have not done a great deal of talking. Unless somebody wants to ask me another question on article 3 of this bill, I come to article 4, which is the insurance provision of the bill, and it is a provision of the bill by which it is more known than any other provision in it.

Mr. SIMS. As I know gentlemen will be asking the gentleman from Texas questions, why not let the gentleman make his statement connectedly and then let the questions come in?

Mr. RAYBURN. I would not know when I got through with my connected statement. I am not going to speak much longer.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is doing all right.

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope I am not wearying the committee.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. QUIN. In reference to this rate of $8 per thousand which you are going to take, is that the same for a man 21 years old as for a man 31 years?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; it is not. The insurance provision of this bill provides that the enlisted man may be allowed to take out from $1,000 to $5,000 insurance. The original bill provided that a man should be allowed to take from $1,000 to $10,000 insurance, and I am candid to say to you I believe the original bill upon that proposition was fairer than the proposition to reduce it to $5,000, and I shall not, so far as I am concerned, resist an amendment, but shall vote for one to raise it to $10,000.

Mr. SIMS. Just vote against the House amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Vote against the House amendment, I mean. You take $5,000 a year. If a man is killed and that is paid in installments, it will run somewhere from $25 to $30 a month for 20 years. That, of course, is pretty small. If you give $10,000 insurance, it will make between $50 and $60, running over a period of about 20 years.

Now, this provision of the bill has been attacked from every angle. I myself never was against this provision of the bill, but I was under the impression somehow when we went into hearings on this bill that the insurance bureau could and ought to be closed up when the war is over, and I asked some questions along that line in the committee. I asked the question: We are going to close up the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance for ships and cargoes when the war is over; why can not we close this bureau up and go out of the insurance business when this war is over? That question, of course, has occurred to many men here. That question occurred to men in the cloakroom just awhile ago, and they asked me what about that, and said they were going to vote for an amendment to close up this bureau when the war was over. Now, gentlemen, you can not close this bureau when the war is over. If you try to close it you are going to do one of the most serious injustices to the men who have gone into this Army who have taken out this insurance that could possibly be done to a set of men. If a man dies, if he is killed, of course the family will begin to collect this insurance, and for that reason alone this bureau can not be entirely closed up. It has got to be kept open to pay these monthly installments to the man's family. If a man is partially disabled and gets this insurance, not being totally disabled, what are you going to do with him? Are you going to cancel the insurance when the war is over, when his insurability has been destroyed, when he can not get additional insurance in any company in the world? Are you going to turn him out when he can not get insurance?

But some gentlemen say, let us pay regularly, let us pay for the deaths, let us keep the insurance of men who are disabled, but let the fellow who goes unscathed get out of this insurance. It is wrong for us to pay for them. This argument has been made to me several times. If a man is killed, if a man is totally disabled, they are willing to carry the man upon the insurance rolls of this country who is so much disabled that he can not get insurance in other companies, but the strong, the healthy, the athletic fellow who comes out of this war unhurt, who will live 40 or 50 years, they want to turn him over to the insurance companies and leave the Government of the United States with the bag to hold. Why, these strong, well, and sound men who come out of this war unhurt, their premiums will run this bureau for many years to come, and that is the reason why we should not turn them over to the other insurance companies, and it would be worse than inhuman, it would be criminal in the highest degree, if we take these men and insure their lives and when they come out of the Army partially disabled, not able to get insurance in any company, to say to them they can not have this Government insurance, but they must go through life without any insurance whatever.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman insists, I will; yes, go ahead.

Mr. SWITZER. The gentleman has given study to this. What is the gentleman's belief as to the percentage of the number of soldiers who will take advantage of this insurance, and to what amount?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, the actuaries have stated and have calculated that they thought that this insurance would run on an average to $2,500 for 25 per cent of the men.

Mr. SWITZER. One of them says 10 or 15 per cent. Does the gentleman believe that a system would be finally satisfactory to the people and to the soldiers that in its working out only resulted in benefit to 10 or 15 per cent of the soldiers, or 25 per cent? Whether it is due to their own negligence or not I do not care about. Do you believe a system that would work out that way would be satisfactory?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not believe we can legislate the millennium in this country or make men equal either mentally, morally, or financially. We can not legislate into men or teach them that they ought to use the judgment that God has given them, and I would not be in favor of this insurance if it said that each man in the Army had to take out this insurance. This insurance business is entirely optional. Are we going to deny to those men who would take out this insurance, whose insurability will be destroyed in the Army, for the simple reason that some other fellow will not take it out?

Mr. SWITZER. Did not the experts before your committee state that this is to take the place of what we now call the service pension, a gratuity, and that it will not do what they say it will, because three-fourths of them will not take it out and they will be in here 15 or 20 years from now asking for a pension? And why should the people be so deceived as to believe that this will take the place of a gratuity or of a service pension hereafter when it will not?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is only the gentleman's opinion. He does not know anything more about it than I do. I say that the compensation provision in this bill is made in lieu of pensions; that both the compensation and the insurance provisions are considered together in lieu of pensions, and the insurance provision of this bill is supposed to be entirely in lieu of a service pension.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have followed the gentleman's examination of others before the committee with much interest. The gentleman seemed to apprehend by one of his questions that when this war closed, and the insurance being sold and the overhead expenses paid by the Government, the Government would insure everybody, and, as I recollect, the Secretary of the Treasury replied that that would be up to the Congress that might be in existence then. Does the gentleman still have some question as to that?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. And God deliver us from that day. I hope that this will not be used as a leverage to pry open the Government Treasury and put it into general insurance business. I would not be candid with the gentleman if I did not say that I believe the enthusiasm of some of our socialistic friends in this country for this bill is because they believe it will be an entering wedge. But my fear that it may be an entering wedge does not come up to my hope that I may do these men the justice that we want to do now. As far as I am concerned, as I stated, and I do not know whether the gentleman was in here or not, but I rather think he was not, one of the questions that he pressed was that we close up the other bureaus when the war is over, and it was my hope that we should close up this bureau when the war was over, but it is absolutely impossible, as I find after an investigation of the question, because we will have men killed; their monthly installments will go along. And we will have some partially disabled, and not enough, though, to collect their insurance then—not amounting to total disability—and we would not feel like closing up the bureau and turning those men out where they can not get insurance in the future. We would not feel like turning loose the strong, healthy fellow who will live 40 or 50 years and help keep up this bureau and help keep up the installments of those who are totally disabled. And for that reason I do not see any way in the world to close up the bureau at all as long as these men live.

Mr. FERRIS. Did the committee consider the feasibility of putting in a proviso that should carry this bureau after the war? My thought is that we are creating so many bureaus.

Mr. RAYBURN. This bureau is already created. Of course, everybody knows it is going to be enlarged a very great deal by this proposition. Now, some men say that only 10 or 15—

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. When this bill was first written it provided for from $1,000 to $10,000 insurance?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Now, some men, when I was out home visiting recently, said this: "We are going to take out $10,000 for our boys." A poor boy living within a block or two from there could only take $1,000, possibly. But the parents of this boy who went into the service could take out $10,000. Why not have an equal amount, say a fixed sum, inasmuch as one life is just as good as another in the service. A poor boy gives his life for the Government, and his life is just as good as another's.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true; but we can not equalize men in this life by legislation or in any other way. We can give them an equal opportunity, and that is all we can do. I say that there is not a man drafted into the service of the United States, or that will be, and there is not a man who is in the service of the United States, even though he be a private, that can not take $10,000 of insurance.

Mr. LOBECK. I am glad to support this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know.

Mr. LOBECK. I am sincere in what I am saying.

Mr. RAYBURN. If you are going to give this boy $80 a year with which to buy $10,000 insurance and give him that extra money to spend in camp life, you will be doing the boy an injustice, and probably he will not be as good a boy when he comes out as he was when he went in.

Mr. MADDEN. On the insurance feature—

Mr. RAYBURN. It is the insurance feature that I am dealing with.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill provides that a man without any relatives, if he takes out any insurance, can not will the insurance he pays for to anybody else. Is there any justice in that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it is entirely just.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope you will tell us why.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think I can tell the gentleman, so that he will feel about it forever as I do. Of course the Government is assuming all of the war risk in this insurance. We want to close every door that we possibly can to fraud under this section of the bill. The United States Government says to the man, if he is between 21 and 31, "You can get insurance on the average of $8 a month." Of course a man 21 years of age can get it for about $7 per thousand. Only one insurance company in the country has made a proposal.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. has made a proposal to carry $300,000,000 insurance for $58 a thousand. The United States Government says to this man, "We will carry that risk for $50 a thousand. We will give you the lowest insurance that you can get as a sound, well man in peace times. If you have a wife, though, or child or mother dependent upon you and you are killed, this insurance money may go to them, because you have a personal and a direct interest in them. Some distant cousin off yonder that you never saw or some uncle, probably, that is living in opulence and who does not need the money, will not get it." When his direct descendants and those directly dependent upon him—as, for example, the wife, children, or mother—have all passed away, when the Government has been generous enough to give him this insurance for $50 per thousand—when all those people are gone—I do not think there could be a better beneficiary than the United States Government.

Mr. MADDEN. But the man himself pays the premiums. If he continues the insurance after the war he must continue to pay the premium?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And he is paying it at peace-time rates.

Mr. RAYBURN. Counting off loading, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. He is paying peace-time rates, and every year that he adds to his life adds to the amount of his premium under the plan while he lives; and if he wants to continue this insurance during his lifetime, even though it be with the Government of the United States, it does not seem to me that he ought to be discriminated against by being prevented from making disposition of the policy upon his death. Of course, I admit that while the war continues the Government does assume a risk of $50 a thousand, but when the war ends the Government does not assume any more risk than any other company assumes.

Mr. RAYBURN. But this man has gotten insurance from the Government under circumstances that nobody else would give.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, during the war?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and it is fixed so that by his pay he can keep it up absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true. But if he was not in the war he would be drawing pay from some other source—more pay than he is drawing from the Government of the United States in the war, and he would be able to buy peace-time risk insurance from an old-line insurance company during the period of the war as well as after the period of the war, and he would be able to make any disposition of his money that he pleased at his death.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I realize that. But I think that under circumstances like those the Government ought to be the beneficiary. In order to do away with all of the fraud that we are trying to escape in this piece of legislation, I believe that that safeguard should be put into it.

Mr. ELSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that if there is any great hardship on the people that are being carried by the Government; that is, if any soldier is not getting as much as he would get from an old-line company, he can transfer his insurance. Having had the risk at less than he can get it from a private company, he could abandon it and take the cheaper one, and that would inure to the Government's benefit.

Mr. MADDEN. But he may have developed some disease in the war and could not pass the examination, and then you put him in the position of not being able to get any insurance elsewhere in the world. While he is getting it cheaper during the war, he is not getting it cheaper after the war.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Under your bill, after the war is over and a man had no dependents, such as you speak of—wife or father or mother or children—would he be permitted to put up his policy for collateral to some outside party not dependent? Would your bill prohibit him from doing that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not presume it would. It would be just the same as any other policy for collateral.

Mr. FIELDS. It would be worthless as collateral, would it not?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; in case he died.

Mr. FIELDS. In the case of a man who had no dependents.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. It might be a great accommodation to him to have a policy that he could put up as collateral.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it might be. It would be a great accommodation to him if we did not have to send him into this war, too; but we can not prevent that.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I understand this, and I want to ask for information. When a soldier is discharged from the service he can not still go on having this insurance by paying $8 a thousand yearly?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; it goes up.

Mr. FOSTER. How much?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not actuary enough to know, but it is renewable yearly, and it will go up, I think, about a dollar or half a dollar a thousand per year.

Mr. FOSTER. But that is smaller in comparison with what the private companies ask.

Mr. RAYBURN. We hope that when this war is over none of our soldiers will be shortsighted enough to retain this yearly renewable policy, because it is the poorest insurance on earth, for the simple reason that when a man pays on that kind of insurance it is just like fire insurance. When he pays and the year is up he has got nothing left. He has had his protection for that year, and we hope that he will convert it into other insurance.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I have been very much interested in what the gentleman has to say on this bill, and it is my misfortune that I was not here when he began his speech. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether or not he believes that if this bill becomes a law it will be any guaranty that there will not be pension legislation in the future for the benefit of the soldiers of this war, the same as there has been for the benefit of soldiers of former wars?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; there is no guaranty against what a future Congress will do; but I think that in this bill there is a moral obligation against another Congress doing that and against the ex-soldier taking it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But if not more than 25 per cent of the soldiers of this war avail themselves of the opportunity that they have under this bill, and 75 per cent are not beneficiaries, does not the gentleman believe that the 75 per cent who are not beneficiaries will demand, and receive, pensions?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think it is any of the business of the Congress to look out for those who do not avail themselves of the opportunity that we offer them. If a man has this insurance offered to him and he does not take it that is not the lookout of Congress. Perhaps the gentleman does not understand that this compensation provision that is in the bill is not optional with the soldier whether he accepts it or not. That is a proposition that is handed to him. He has no option in that. If he is hurt, he gets it. But when we tender this insurance to him and say, "Here is $10,000 insurance that you can get for $80; we know you have got plenty of money, even if you are contributing $15 a month to your family, because you have got $15 left and you can pay $7 a month out of that," we are giving him this opportunity. It will be less than $7 a month for a man 21 years of age; and after paying that he would still have $7.50 left for spending money, and our military leaders say that $7.50 a month is enough money for a private soldier to have in the trenches over there.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I was anxious to get the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not, if this bill becomes a law, it will mean anything more than a temporary benefit to those who avail themselves of the law and will be any guaranty against future pension legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman refers to the insurance provision?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes; and the compensation.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not a question of their availing themselves of the compensation. They get that, it matters not what they do, if they are disabled, or die.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But unless they are killed or disabled—

Mr. RAYBURN. Then they ought not to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But here are at least 75 per cent of the soldiers who will not be beneficiaries under this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am just coming to that in a little while.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Will the gentleman state just as briefly as he can whether or not he believes that the passage of this bill will have a tendency—

Mr. RAYBURN. To stop service pensions?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I do; and I certainly believe that every man who goes into this army and comes out is morally obligated not to ask for service pension.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. RAYBURN. I am allowing you. Go ahead, and ask your question.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman will allow me to make just a brief observation—

Mr. RAYBURN. You fellows are sure questioners. [Laughter.] Go ahead, I like it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Here is a war that will affect every section of this country alike.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. There will be no North and no South. There will not be opposition to pensions under this war as there has been probably under some other wars, and the gentleman knows what a clamor there is for pension legislation. If the passage of this bill would prevent general pension legislation such as we now have and such as is demanded of Congress I would be very much more in favor of it; but my candid opinion is that with 75 per cent of the soldiers out of the fold it will not make one iota of difference in future pension legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Perhaps it will not. I think it will. It will as far as I am concerned; that is a certainty; and there will be just as many of these soldiers in my district as there will be in yours. I feel that I am morally obligated not to vote for service pensions. I believe the boys who go from my territory into this Army and accept or reject the generous offers in this bill are morally obligated not to ask for service pensions. The gentleman says that 75 per cent of the boys will not be benefited by this provision. I do not believe that.

Mr. ASHBROOK. What percentage does the gentleman think will avail themselves of the law?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think a larger percentage than 50 per cent; possibly 80 per cent.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I hope the gentleman is right.

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope it will be 100 per cent, and that they will take $10,000.

Mr. MADDEN. They can not take but $5,000 under this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I mean if it is amended. Now, I want to give my reasons for saying that the men will take this insurance. It is going to be placed before every soldier, and after a man makes all the allowance he is required to make for his family—$15 a month—he has $15 a month left, or $180 a year.

He can take $80 of this $180 and purchase $10,000 worth of life insurance.

That will leave him still $94 a month, as much money and more money than the soldiers along whose side he is fighting in the trenches have, and as much money and more even than the military leaders of this country think they ought to have for the morale of the Army and the morale of the armies by the side of whom they fight. And for that reason when it is demonstrated to these men how easy it is to carry the insurance a large percentage will avail themselves of it. If they do not, we are not to blame. The people of the country who are willing to pay the losses are not to blame. We have offered it to them generously and freely and at a rate that anybody can take and carry during the war. Our skirts are clear and I hope will remain so.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. If these soldiers, after the allowance is made for the family at home, have enough left to pay the insurance premium, say for the amount carried in the bill, $5,000, why would it not be a good thing for the country, for the whole Nation, and for the Government to retain that insurance premium from their pay without their consent and carry the $5,000 insurance for each soldier without regard to his wages? Would not that be a good thing for the country, compelling the negligent man and the careless man to protect his family and to protect his neighbors and friends who might have to come to his support?

Mr. RAYBURN. When I agreed to vote for the provision in this bill that gives, under regulations, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy the right to take half of a man's pay and hold it for him, I went the limit of interfering with his business. I am not going to say that he shall take out insurance. I want to say that the old bachelors like I am can take care of themselves.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. And yet if it was for the welfare of the country generally, and for the welfare of the men who are too indifferent to take out insurance, would not it appear to be our duty to see to it that every soldier did protect his family?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, it would be for the welfare and happiness of a great many men if more men had guardians, but I would not be willing to vote for it.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the gentleman concludes, I would like to have him discuss the question of the limitation of 120 days within which a man may take out insurance. Does that mean 120 days from enlistment or 120 days from the proclamation? After that period has elapsed he has no option at all to take out insurance, has he?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; he has not. There ought to be limitation.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the purpose of it?

Mr. RAYBURN. The purpose is this: We say that for the boys who have gone into the Army and who may be killed before the bill is passed we will carry the insurance for them. They should not be cut off, and we have fixed it so that if they are killed or suffer total disability they shall be paid for that.

Mr. BORLAND. That is, you assume that they have taken out insurance.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. Then, on the other side of the ledger, we thought there ought to be a limitation. After they have been in the trenches and have been in the Army six months or a year from now, when they have not participated in the insurance and shown no disposition to do it, we think we should put a restriction upon them, and so we have fixed it at 120 days. It had to be something. It could have been put at 6 months or 30 days; but we thought 4 months was a happy medium. It can be advertised to every man in the service in that time so that he can understand it and make arrangements in that time if he wants to take out insurance. Of course a limit ought to be set somewhere.

Mr. BORLAND. Why would it not answer the purpose to say that a man should be deemed to be insured for the first 30 or 90 or 120 days, and that thereafter he would not be deemed to be insured unless he had put in an application and paid the premium?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly what this is.

Mr. BORLAND. No; it says that after 120 days he loses his right to apply for insurance. That is my reading of it. He must apply within 120 days. Is not that the case?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; that is the case.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, it seems to me that he ought to be deemed insured for the first period of enlistment, when he may not have had the opportunity to apply, and then say at the limit of 120 days the Government would carry on his insurance, but any time within three years or two years after he might apply and pay a premium and come in and take the insurance. During the second year of the war the man might conclude that the insurance was desirable, when he did not feel so strongly during the first year. Now, as the result of this provision he would be entirely excluded from taking insurance when a new man just drafted and taken into the field would have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the truth, and we think the limit ought to be fixed somewhere.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that in this insurance matter the rights of the Government ought also to be considered. If it is a good thing for these men to come in early in the war and participate in the benefits, it is hardly fair for them to hold out and let the Government carry the burden during the two or three years and then at the close come in and get the benefits. I supposed that the provision was drafted on that theory.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like the gentleman to allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. RAYBURN. All right.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to hear the gentleman on the question of the reasons for allowing the commutation of compensation for which this bill provides.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, yes; it does provide for that.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is a very important feature of the bill, and I would like to hear the reasons for it.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is a very important feature. We simply thought this—

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to know what impelled the committee to reach the conclusion they could commute.

Mr. RAYBURN. We really thought this, that here is a bureau of the Government entirely in charge of this matter. Here is a bureau of the Government that has the records of these men, the records of the disability covering him as a man and everything about him. That man may want to go into business that will be valuable to him. He may buy a little farm that he can pay probably half on and probably wants to pay the rest. We thought that if he pays half on it and has nothing more than that and is likely to have a bad crop and get it taken away or something like that—we thought in special cases that that commutation would be a real service to the man himself, with the deductions, of course, that must come.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit. I think perhaps if it were confined to the purchase, say, of a farm or something of that sort, it might be all right.

Mr. RAYBURN. He might want to go into merchandise.

Mr. MADDEN. But the records of business show that 95 per cent of all the people who go into business fail. The fair assumption is that a man who has got this pension as the result of his injuries has no special business experience, but he may reach the conclusion after studying that he wants to invest some money in something in which he is sure to fail, and I think if you allow him the commutation you just give him an opportunity to lose that much.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I think not. The gentleman says this man has no experience. I do not agree with that at all. The man is likely to have been a very good business man and a very fine young man in some store, or something like that, when he had both legs. Now, he is likely to get both legs shot off.

That would not prevent that young man from being at the head of a business. It would not keep him from managing a business even if he had both legs off, but he could not go to work for somebody else in a store, whereas he could run one of his own. He could not rent a farm from somebody else, but he could own one and run it of his own, and we believe in special cases with the records that it might be doing a fellow a very great benefit, and it certainly would not hurt the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. It would not hurt the Government, but it might hurt the man.

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand the gentleman's theory. We think in some special cases it should be done, and in no case could it hurt the Government, because it amounted to the same thing, and it might be of a very great service to his family.

Mr. SIMS. It is only a part that can be commuted.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose they commute and pay and he fails. Say he has one leg off. Does not the gentleman think that all these people will be cared for by legislation?

Mr. RAYBURN. They might ask to be cared for.

Mr. CANNON. Would not we care for them?

Mr. RAYBURN. I presume in some cases they would ask for it.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman please turn to page 28, line 13, which does not seem to be very clear to me, and I would like to ask the gentleman what his interpretation of it is. This is the sentence that provides that soldiers shall have insurance if within 120 days he dies or is permanently disabled. In the first place it does not provide, as I understand it, what the amount shall be. Now, the amount of insurance may be from $1,000 to $5,000 or from $1,000 to $10,000. There is no implication here as to what amount shall be paid. Does the gentleman catch what I have in mind? Will a man receive, for instance, $1,000 or will he receive $5,000 or $10,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. For what?

Mr. MADDEN. But he never has made application.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is put somewhere at $5,000, is it not?

Mr. TOWNER. But, suppose he dies. That is when he lives and in case he does not take it out. In other words, what is the presumption—that he has taken it out at $1,000 or $5,000 or $10,000, as the case may be?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think about $25 a month for 20 years runs something like $5,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but, remember, that can be applicable in the case where a man is totally disabled. Suppose he dies?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the same thing applies. If you will read on down, when he dies before he shall have secured 240 of such installments, the balance of such 240 monthly installments shall be paid, and so forth. The gentleman means when he is killed in action?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Before he takes the insurance out?

Mr. TOWNER. Before any insurance is taken out; before any installments could be paid.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, the same amount would apply that would apply if he was totally disabled.

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true; but suppose he takes out $1,000 and is killed; that is all his family gets?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. He might take out $5,000, and they would get $5,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. It seems to me it is not clear how much the family would get in case he was totally disabled.

Mr. RAYBURN. The same provision applies if he is totally disabled as would apply if he died.

Mr. TOWNER. No; I do not think it says that.

Mr. RAYBURN. Probably it is not clear; but that is what is meant, anyhow. Possibly the language is not entirely clear; but it is intended that his family should get the same if he dies as he would get if he lived and was totally disabled.

Mr. TOWNER. Still the gentleman will see that that might be any sum from $1,000 to $5,000, and it does not clear up the difficulty. If it was intended now that his family should receive, in case of his death, $25 payments for 240 monthly installments—

Mr. RAYBURN. If he is totally disabled, he gets $25 as long as he lives. If he dies before 240 payments, then his family gets enough to make up the balance of the 240 payments.

Mr. TOWNER. I wish the gentleman would give that matter attention.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is what we intend, namely, that his family shall get what he has been getting, on up to until 240 payments. If it is not clear, we will be glad to try to make it so.

Mr. TOWNER. I thought probably it was the intention of the committee to see that his family, if he was killed in action, should receive 240 payments of $25 each monthly.

Mr. RAYBURN. I say I think that is what we mean, and if the language is not clear or if it is not legal we will be very glad to change it. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Permit me to suggest that this insurance is only payable at death, and if the party dies before this law is promulgated, before he has the selection of 120 days to insure, his family will get the maximum sum of $10,000.

Mr. TOWNER. It does not so state here.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it does. That is the intent.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. OSBORNE. On page 18, lines 16 and 17—

Mr. RAYBURN. I had hoped that those things would go over until the five-minute rule, but I will try to answer it if I can.

Mr. OSBORNE. On page 20, lines 13 and 14, I read "the maximum monthly compensation for total disability shall be $200." And in the other case, "for disability, $200." What does that mean? It says $200 monthly compensation.

Mr. RAYBURN. It means it matters not what a man's rank is or what his pay is, when he is killed they do not have to pay his family over $200 a month.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to quit—

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. There is just one question I would like to ask, if the gentleman will permit. I would like to know, as a matter of information, if it is possible for a soldier who is to go out on the firing line to take out insurance to-day with the old-line insurance companies?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Can you tell me what the rate is?

Mr. RAYBURN. The average war rate is about $58 a thousand for a man who will get this insurance for $8 a thousand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What would be the normal rate apart from war, compared with that $58?

Mr. RAYBURN. Eight dollars in peace times. But in war it would be $58.

Mr. REED. It has come to my knowledge just to-day of a young man who could not get insurance in an old-line company but he has been passed in this draft. Now, that leads up to the thought that the Government will insure a great many people and give them an opportunity to have insurance for the rest of their lives who could not get it in old-line companies.

Mr. RAYBURN. And if the Government takes a man and pronounces him sound and puts him out in the war to incur these dangers, it ought to take him as an insurance risk.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman stated that the old-line insurance companies would give a man insurance now who went into the war at $58 a thousand?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. offered to take $300,000,000 at that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In peace time what would the Metropolitan Life have given that at?

Mr. RAYBURN. Eight dollars a thousand, if they write that kind of insurance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Just the rate you propose by the Government?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope I have not wearied the House.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Do you state that you can get insurance now for $8 a thousand?

Mr. RAYBURN. I might not in some companies. I do not know whether the Metropolitan Life writes that kind of insurance or not.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They do not. It costs $20 a thousand.

Mr. RAYBURN. There are plenty of companies that will write this for $8 a thousand, and I do not know but that the Metropolitan Life will do that itself. I say, I do not know. I know they said they would take $300,000,000 at $58 a thousand, while the Government is willing to take it at $8 a thousand.

As I started out to say, Mr. Chairman, of course I would probably have enjoyed more making a connected statement, but I have not failed to enjoy being asked these questions, and my only apology is for the fact that I have taken up so much of the time of the House. I believe that this is a piece of real constructive legislation. I believe that it will help us, if it is passed and passed speedily, to quiet the fears of a great many people of this country and that it will bring about an enthusiasm for the war and enthusiasm at home such as very few things would do. I hope that it will be speedily passed by the House and speedily passed by the Senate and that we may add this much to try to win this war and bring it to a speedy conclusion. I am through. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know whether the committee gave any consideration to the cost, the increasing cost—the first-year cost, and the second-year cost, and so on?

Mr. RAYBURN. We have appropriated here what we think the first cost would be.

Mr. MADDEN. That is about $160,000,000 or $170,000,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. Of course as the war goes on it will get bigger and bigger. There is no question about that. I think there is a report here from an actuary who says something about that. I do not know. I think it is in Wolf's statement—a statement of what the second-year cost will be of this insurance.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that is one of the important factors in connection with it and it ought to be presented to the committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not remember it, I am frank to say. I thank the House. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I hope to be able to get my general views with reference to this bill before the House. I was one of the Members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—there were only about four of us—who went on with the hearings, although we had no quorum, because it was urged to be for the benefit of the soldiers.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to have it understood by the House that this bill was reported by the committee without a quorum?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; but the hearings were held without a quorum. I was one of the bare quorum that was brought back here in order to get this bill before the House in some shape.

I myself from the beginning was very doubtful as to whether it would do the work that was required for the protection of our soldiers, and in view of the debate thus far I feel justified in the opinions that I expressed in my views as printed, not only separately, but in the Record, and I wish that everybody would read them—I shall not repeat them—as to the details of this bill.

We want to do all we can for the protection of our soldiers and for the protection of their families. My view is, in brief, that so far as provision during their service for their families is concerned, by what they call allotment of pay and family allowance, this bill only muddles it, because it takes its administration away from the War and Navy Departments, which administer it in every other country and which administered it during our border warfare here for our National Guard, and puts that administration where a separate application has to be made to a separate new bureau of the Treasury. Probably this matter ought to be provided for by a short statute somewhat on the model that we used when we sent our National Guard to the border. It worked well, and I think I can show that the method proposed by this bill will not work well.

In the second place, there is a provision for payment by the Government to the man after he gets out of the service, in case of his disability, or to his family if he dies. They call that "compensation." They say it is not a pension, because a pension is a charity. Pension is not a charity. Pension is a payment as defined in Webster, made by a government to persons in consideration of services. Here it is:

Pension: A stated allowance or stipend made, in consideration of past services or of the surrender of rights or emoluments, to one retired from service; especially a regular stipend paid by a government to retired public officers, disabled soldiers, the families of soldiers killed in service, etc.

Compensation is just such a payment. It is a pension, and in so far as this bill deals with amendments to our pension laws, some of its provisions may be in the right direction. But some of them are violent changes that have not been approved either by our Commissioner of Pensions or by experts in that regard. They have not passed the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which have to do with the subject, and they have not passed the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs, which have a large interest in the questions of compensation paid to our Army and Navy under the law, and I think, therefore, that it is dangerous to include these amendments in such a bill as this. Certain points are already noticed by this House in which the changes are certainly not for the benefit of the Army or for the benefit of the Government.

Now, the third proposition is one that they call "insurance," to be established and carried on by an entirely new department, which, by the way, is to oust the Pension Department from its work, work which it understands, with all its traditions and precedents, and to put in new officers and new managers. And now it is proposed to add a so-called "insurance." That insurance provision is drawn so as to apply to an army in peace as well as in war, allowing the Government to insure a man between certain ages in sums from $1,000 to $5,000. At first the limit was $10,000. But they went on to say that during war the man shall pay only a peace insurance risk; that is, the risk of his dying; but be insured during the war not only against the risk of dying, but against being disabled during that year. His ordinary risk in time of peace is less than $8 a thousand per year; that is, less than 8 men of from 20 to 25 years of age die out of a thousand during a year. All the testimony before us is to the effect that in war time 75 out of 1,000 men at the front are killed and 50 disabled, so as to make the risk 125 out of every 1,000 instead of 8; and the Government is assuming all that risk for a nominal payment by those who choose to take out the insurance. It is a provision which, if only a few take out insurance, gives such an advantage to that few as is beyond fairness, while if all take out insurance, with an Army of 2,000,000 men at the front, one year's losses, at the rate stated which exist there, will amount to $1,270,000,000. It is a matter of some importance.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The liability of the Government would be distributed over 20 years, would it not, for payment?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. For the first year, yes; and the second year again, and the third year again, and if this war lasts five years it will be a heavy liability.

Mr. Chairman, if distributed annually and paid for by the Government, after all it is nothing but a pension. It is something that the man has not paid for, because he has not bought that insurance. Nine-tenths of it is furnished by the Government. There is no excuse for establishing a new bureau, with all sorts of offices, for the sake of providing Government State insurance in time of peace for any army, whether it has been at war or not. That is what the bill provides. Now, I propose to take up these topics in order.

Mr. SWITZER. If the gentleman will yield, right on that point, it occurs to me that the man who is benefited by this insurance, according to the report, not only gets the compensation but he would have additional compensation for merely paying $8.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Just so, and it will be probably the men who can spare the $8 best, the single men or those who have no families dependent upon them, who will get that extra benefit.

Mr. SWITZER. A man gets additional compensation which he does not pay for.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; he pays $8, and he gets $117 free. He gets a great deal more than that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does not the gentleman think that the Government ought to be willing to pay that compensation to those men who are willing to risk their lives?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think the Government should pay a proper compensation or pension to every man, and I do not think the men ought to pay a single dollar for insurance. In my opinion, the insurance scheme is a humbug.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman think it is fair to donate five-sixths or seven-eighths of this insurance to the man who pays this small premium?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No.

Mr. STEENERSON. And withhold it from the others?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; I do not. It ought to be given to all or to none if we are for equality in the Army. To get down to some of the details of the bill. We do not want to send married men to this war except as officers, who get enough pay to take care of their families. It is said that the National Guard of some States have discharged every married man, and will not take married men under any circumstances. Other States allow them to go. If a man is drafted and has a wife or family dependent upon him for support, he can be exempted. If he does not ask for the exemption, of course he will go under the draft, and as a result there are entirely too many married men in our Army at $33 a month. Perhaps they ought not to be accepted. I remember an officer in the Spanish-American War who refused to take any man who was married or had dependents. He tried to get men who wanted to fight and go into battle and run their risks, and not men who were thinking of the dear ones at home. He wanted the young and the unmarried, and men who were warriors by nature, and not the men who had families dependent upon them. Perhaps he was right, although we have some men in this country, thank God, like the former President of the United States, ready to sacrifice everything to fight for their country, and it would be better to send such men to fight than to keep them at home. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If it is on this point.

Mr. GORDON. It is on the very point you just referred to, about that officer in the Spanish War refusing volunteers because they were married. Do you know of any law that authorized him to do that at that time? That was before we had this conscription.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. He could accept whom he pleased.

Mr. GORDON. He could?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Where did he get the authority to do that?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Because he was filling up a regiment of volunteers under the State law, and he selected the best men that he could get.

Mr. GORDON. Do you know of any State law that authorized him to reject from the National Guard anybody because he was married? I should like to know the name of that State.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. He wanted a good regiment, and he got a good fighting regiment of the very best sort. We do not know whether he was technically right or wrong. It is known that the feeling of Congress, when we passed the last draft law, was that we did not want married men in the Army, but they are putting them in, and it is really too bad. But, now that they are in, it is the duty of every country that has married men in the ranks to provide for their families. The United States did when we sent our men to the Mexican border, and did it very easily. Under the appropriation act of August 27, 1916—

The sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, for the support of, at a cost of not more than $50 per month, or so much of said amount as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, and not more than such enlisted man has been contributing monthly to the support of his family at the time of his being called or drafted into the service of the United States or during his enlistment period in the Regular Army at the time of such call or draft of the Organized Militia or National Guard, the family of each enlisted man of the Organized Militia or National Guard called or drafted into the service of the United States until his discharge from such service, and the family of each enlisted man of the Regular Army until his discharge from active service therein or until the discharge of the Organized Militia or National Guard from such service if such enlisted man is at that time in active service in the Regular Army, which family, during the term of service of such enlisted man has no other income, except the pay of such enlisted man, adequate for the support of said family: Provided, That the action of the Secretary of War in all cases provided for in this paragraph shall be final, and no right to prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims or in any other court of the United States against the Government of the United States shall accrue to such enlisted man, or to any member of the family of any such enlisted man, by virtue of the passage of this act: And provided further, That this paragraph shall not apply to any such enlisted man who shall marry after the 15th day of July, 1916; and the word "family" shall include only wife, children, and dependent mothers.

Something like this ought to be the law now and ought to come in now from the Appropriations Committee. There should be an appropriation made to take care of the families of enlisted men. That provision was only for support from the Government—a family allowance. Every government now with married men in the war exercises another privilege. The United States has always said that when its soldiers were sent abroad there ought to be some way of their pay being paid to their families by the paymaster. There was a law passed in 1899, when we sent men to the Philippines, of this character. I read section 871 of the military law. There are other sections referring to details afterwards.

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to permit enlisted men of the United States Army to make allotments of their pay, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the support of their families or their relatives, for their own savings, or for other purposes, during such time as they may be absent on distant duty or under other circumstances warranting such action.

There are five or six sections with reference to the details. The allotments are to be paid to the allottees, and the Secretary of War has managed the whole matter.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The payments referred to in that section were made out of the soldier's monthly pay.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is so. It is out of the soldier's pay.

Mr. McKENZIE. The Government did not contribute anything extra.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from New Jersey ought to be interrupted. He has given a great deal of study to this and he ought to be heard. I would like to hear what he has to say about it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Now, in Canada and other countries they have done something like what is provided in Article 2 of this bill. They have provided for an allowance for the family—part from the man's pay and part from the Government. The figures given in the bill seem pretty fair, but I have no doubt the Secretary of War could make regulations just as good if we had an act passed like that we had in the war at the border. The Canadian law says that the Government will allot so much to the family, provided the soldier consents to allot at least half of his pay, or 20 days' pay a month.

The result is, for a private of the rank and file $20 a month is allotted by the Government for the needs of the dependents of the soldier. They call it a separation allowance. They say that when the separation allowance is being paid it is compulsory for him to assign at least half the pay of his rank.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. What pay does the soldier get in Canada?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. About the same as he does here, I think, $30 a month; but I am not quite certain.

Now, with those who get more, more would be allotted out of the pay, because if the pay was $50 or $60 a month, $30 would come out of the soldier's pay, and in the case of a sergeant $25 is allotted from his pay and granted by the Government. With warrant officers $30 from each.

That is practically the principle suggested in this bill. Probably the bill gives fair amounts, and it might be better to put the figures in a statute; but the trouble about the whole matter is in administration. When the War Department enlists a man it asks him, "Have you a wife?" "Yes." "And children?" "Yes." "Dependent on you?" "Yes." The recruiting officer acting for the Government, or some one in its behalf, goes around and verifies the fact, and says that is so. Then they can make an arrangement with the man that the War Department will pay directly to his family half of the pay and also the allowance made by the Government. It is all done promptly, as was done by us under the statute referred to when soldiers went to the border.

But under this bill no such allowance can be made until an application has been filed with the new bureau of the Treasury presided over by the commissioner of naval and military insurance. And when he makes the award an amount equal to the Government allowance and not more than half of his pay and not less than $15 shall be allotted from his pay.

Imagine a million men that are drafted, that have been called to their camps or have gone to the front. Their families are left without support under this bill—must wait to file applications to a new bureau which will have a million or two million such applications before they can make an award.

No allowance can be made by the Government, no allotment can be made until the applications have gone through this new bureau where new officers are gathered from all over the country, with no local acquaintance such as was had by the recruiting officer, and the family are left without any allotment of pay and no allowance is made until this is done. Pass such a bill as this and you will have the whole country down upon the Congress that made such an absolutely unworkable scheme for getting money to the families of our soldiers.

Article II is right in its object. It is all wrong when it entrusts allotment of pay and family allowance to a separate bureau. This must be done by the recruiting officer or an officer in charge of it right then and there when the man is taken into the service, so that the War Department will pay the allotment and allowance to the family. We did this once and can do it again. We can not wait for a million cases to be taken care of in the Treasury Department.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it the gentleman's notion that this pay to the family of the soldier should be made on the allotment of the recruiting officer of the War Department while in the meantime the wife and child or children of the soldier may have died and the conditions changed? Is that the gentleman's notion?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is the recruiting officers of the Army and Navy who find out about these changes from time to time. The operation would be simple. The person who has charge of the draft has the returns as to whether the man has dependents or not. Those returns come into the War Department from the officers charged with drafting men.

The officer of the War department who drafts the man deals with him from the beginning. They make returns. Thereupon the paymaster pays. If the man is discharged from the service the paymaster is ordered not to pay. The whole is managed as part of the business of the War Department. It is part of the Pay Department, as well, and has to be managed there and nowhere else. Now, so far as section 2 is concerned, even if we keep the particular provisions of the statute which perhaps are not unfair, everything in reference to this new bureau should be stricken out. For example, section 204 says:

That a family allowance of not exceeding $50 per month shall be granted and paid by the United States upon written application to the bureau by such enlisted man or by or on behalf of any prospective beneficiary, etc.

Under another section an award of the bureau must be made. When the award is made an allotment of pay may be made equal to the amount of the allowance. How you are chasing these awards and allotments back and forth from one department to another. Application is made to the Treasury on behalf of the beneficiary after some poor fellow has gone to France, who, perhaps, does not believe and does not acknowledge a wife, and that question must be litigated before the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, so called, in the Treasury Department, when the man is in France, instead of having been settled on the original enlistment or draft by the War or Navy Departments; not, perhaps, by the enlisting or recruiting officers, but by some person in charge of these enlistments or recruitments who has charge of this matter of allotments and who sees that they are taken care of.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman explain to the committee why it was recommended that allotments should be made to a divorced wife of a soldier?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is done in Canada if the courts have already allowed alimony. The committee thought in that case we were bound to carry out the award of the court in granting alimony.

Mr. MADDEN. This does not say anything about alimony in this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; it says to the extent the court orders such payment.

Mr. PLATT. I have read this bill several times and there are a good many features of it I do not quite understand. Now, the allotment is made compulsory to the wife. Suppose here is a man who is drafted. He appeals to the local exemption board for exemption on the ground that he has a wife and family dependent upon him and they say they are not dependent? He appeals to the district board and they refuse exemption. What status is he in? Will his wife get this allowance?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is a conundrum; I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. And it has been finally decided his family is not dependent on him?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is impossible to go over all of these questions, because I have only an hour, and can not go into all the details of this bill. The moment that the law makes two masters, one the War or Navy Department, the other a bureau of the Treasury, which has not had anything to do with enlistment, does not know anything about the soldiers, but gets all its information from the War and Navy Departments, the matter goes into inextricable confusion, with transfers and letters and communications between these various departments to such an extent that it is not a workable plan. If there should be a compulsory allotment taken from the pay, whether for a family allowance or because he should not have so much pay, it is for the House to decide whether there should be such a compulsory allotment, and if the Government gives anything else as a family allowance, let it be done through the same authorities who enlist and draft or recruit the man and know his status and not in any other way. There is no sense in calling in the Treasury or a new bureau. The estimates are for 40 per cent of families dependent. Probably there is no such large proportion of the privates who have families dependent on them, but there may be in the future. It may be that family men must be called into service of the United States, and there ought to be an amendment, either to this old law as to the Army and Navy, or else a simple law like the appropriation which was made in 1916 and continued during several years. Some such provision as that can be made now in the pending deficiency bill which will take care of this.

Mr. MADDEN. Did this bill originate in the War Department, or in the Navy Department, or the Department of Commerce, or the Treasury Department, or in the committee?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Who knows? It came to the committee with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. It was helped by Judge Mack, who is a very lovely man and who has taken great interest in it. He is a judge; he knows something about insurance, too. It is likewise favored to a certain extent by the commissioner of insurance of Wisconsin, Mr. Ecker, who favors a different plan of insurance; not a 1-year term policy, but a 20-payment insurance. Capt. Wolfe explained the Canadian allotment to us, but did not say anything in favor of this new bureau.

There should be a compulsory allotment of pay and a family allowance. But a separate bureau would create a confusion that destroys the rights of the soldier, and I will never vote for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman ever seen the letter written by the Commissioner of Pensions to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, in which he discusses this bill and is rather inclined to be opposed to it?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. When I get through with what I want to say about pensions we can refer to that letter. I have not got to pensions yet.

Now, the third article of this bill is purely and simply a pension bill. Possibly none of our committee knew anything about pensions. Not one of us ever served on the Committee on Pensions. We all of us know about private pension bills, of course, inasmuch as we have had claims from time to time. We know of some of the benefits of the present pension laws. Poor fellows without arms and legs who now are paid $100 a month would get considerably less under this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. While the gentleman is on pensions, I would like to ask him another question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will wait until I get through with pensions, then I will yield to him.

We know, of course, also some things that sometimes seem to be abuses of the pension laws; for instance, where a man who has been somewhat hurt by disease, we will say by dysentery, down in the swamps of Chickahominy, and who died 50 years afterwards of a return of that disease and has received a pension perhaps for a disability of that sort. Shortly before he died he is married to a young wife, or a wife has married him, and the Government pays her a pension which may last for nearly 100 years after the war, as Revolutionary pensions have done. Such things are not unknown. Pension legislation is the most difficult as well as the most righteous branch of legislation that comes before Congress, and it is hard to make a proper pension law. The Committee on Commerce knows nothing of the subject by experience. I confess that I was rather reluctant to have a bill put through without knowledge which would mean an entirely new system of pensions. The committee did amend this bill so as to provide that a wife who would receive a pension should be a wife at the time of the injury. It is a question whether the House will stand by that or not. There are two sides to the question.

There is one rather peculiar thing about this bill, and that is as to the widows of officers. Widows of officers, it is to be confessed, have not been properly treated by the old pension law. That law was passed about 100 years ago, and it provided for pensions for total disability to a private of $8 a month, and rising to $30 a month for a colonel, or something of that sort, which was the highest pensions for total disability in the day of cheap prices. It was likewise provided that a widow should receive the same pension after her husband died that he received, so that the widow of the private would receive $8 a month and the colonel's widow would receive $30. From time to time the pension for total disability has been changed without reference to rank, until a man who is totally disabled, even if a private, sometimes receives $100 a month for certain sort of injuries, while the widow of Admiral Farragut by the general law would have received only $30 a month, not enough for her to live upon in the station in which she had lived, or to do anything except starve.

Probably the pension laws ought to be amended. I do not contend they are right. But I am not quite certain, but it is a case of fools rushing in where angels fear to tread, when a committee that knows nothing about pensions provides incidentally that widows shall receive 25 per cent of the pay of the soldier for life, and not less than $30 a month. A major general's pay is $8,000. There are some major generals who do not see very much service. We had some men during the Civil War who were made major generals and who dropped to the rear very quickly, but may have finally died from injury in the service. A man is put upon the retired list in the Army for disability which was incident or disease which was incident to the service, and it is generally held to be such a disability if the disease has come without any fault of his own while he has been serving, and they do not look too closely into the fact as to whether he crooked the elbow too much or was careless about his exercise or ate too much.

In such a case retired pay would go to him, and 25 per cent probably in the future would go to the widow. Twenty-five per cent of $8,000 is $2,000 a year. And if that old, retired officer has married a wife and has small children the pension may run up to $200 a month. If abuses have existed under the present pension law, by young women marrying old men for the sake of pensions, what may happen when there will be prizes of $2,000 a year to be gotten?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman says he thinks the present pension law should be revised. Does he not think the proper way to get at that would be for some Member to introduce a bill to amend the present general pension laws, and refer it to the proper committee, the committee that has given some attention, some study, to these pension laws, and let the bill be reported by that committee with the proper recommendation? Does not the gentleman think that is the way to get at this without bringing this legislation in a bill before a committee that has never had anything to do with pensions?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will pardon my answer, I do not know how we can get proper pension legislation if I judge from the way I have seen pension legislation go through this House. But it is certain that it is not the proper way for a committee, without any report from the Commissioner of Pensions, or the Committee on Pensions, or the War Department, or the Navy Department, to put a bill before this House and ask for its passage.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think you are right.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is all I have to say. I have opposed it for that reason. I do think that there should be something better done for the widows of officers. Possibly it should be confined, however, to the widows of officers who are killed in the war. If the proposition is to give 25 per cent of the officers' pay to the widows of officers killed in war on the field of battle or dying of wounds, I will say "Yes" every time. Perhaps we might put in the limit, however, that the pension should not be over $100 a month in any individual case. Perhaps that is enough, and $2,000 might be considered too much. Yet I do not want to impose my judgment upon the House, because I do not know; and I believe that no Member should advocate before this House the passage of any measure as to which he is so profoundly ignorant as I am in this case—except in certain minor matters—about the operations of the pension laws or what is really the fair way to take care of the old soldier and his family liberally and well.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. I want to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the possibility of an appeal being made by the present pensioners for higher rates immediately upon this bill becoming effective.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Probably we will get all the appeals that we could get on any subject. Those will come.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman says, if I understood him correctly, that this bill would apply to about 40 per cent of the Army.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; but the hearings said so.

Mr. PLATT. Is that in the hearings?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; it is in the hearings. Otherwise I would not have put it in my statement. You will find the reference to the page in the minority views.

Mr. PLATT. Who made that statement?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have forgotten. It is on the authority of the man who made up this thing.

Mr. PLATT. I doubt very much whether it is anywhere near the truth.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I doubt so, too; or, if it is more than 10 per cent. But I want to say this, however: If we pass this new compensation or pension law—for if you strike out the "com" and the "at" you have nothing but "pension," and the words "compensation" and "pension" mean the same thing. [Applause.]

Even if we pass these new rates, we are asked to do an unheard-of thing. The United States now has a bureau that knows all about pensions, with men all over the United States ready to investigate every particular case. The bureau has its local agents and its special agents and its headquarters men, and it understands all of the applications of the law, and yet this bill proposes to tell it, "You shall have nothing to do with this." It is to be referred to a new bureau of the Treasury Department, with power to employ all the clerks, experts, and actuaries and do everything that they please. Certainly no sensible man, managing ordinary business and already having in charge a branch of his business, devoted to the management of that particular thing—compensation for death or disability—would ever refer that matter to some other bureau. This new bureau is purely commercial, a bureau with reference to war-risk insurance, a bureau in which they take care of foreign cargoes and foreign crews and foreign vessels engaged in foreign commerce. This bill makes this matter of pensions to soldiers an adjunct to that bureau of sea voyages and adds the question of allotting the allowance to the soldiers and their families.

It is hard to know how to amend the bill. We can strike out, but it is a question whether it will be germane on the principles of the bill to amend by providing that this whole question of pensions shall be administered in the Bureau of Pensions. Let somebody who is a "sharp" on the question of what is legal under the rules of this House answer on that. I am doubtful. Perhaps our only remedy is, if we can, to change the "compensation" to "pension," and strike out the new bureau.

Mr. SNYDER. Can you tell us what percentage of the French Army has been killed, including those who died of wounds, in the first six months of this war?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not as to the French Army. But if the gentleman will read over my views he will find that it is stated in the hearings that the best report from the Canadian forces and the English forces is to the effect that 75 out of every 1,000 were killed in the first year and 50 out of that number were disabled.

Mr. SNYDER. Has not that been reduced considerably since then?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I hope it has.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not a fact that a noted French statistician gives the statement that the French Army in the first year lost nearly 16 per cent and in the first six months of this year the total casualty list was 5.2 per cent?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; and in the battle of the Marne they nearly whipped the German Army by going forward and taking the necessary risks. Now they are fighting in the trenches and not doing very much and not winning very much. I do not think that battles can be fought and victories won, or wars won, without great loss of life.

Last comes the insurance question. In this insurance business there is established a bureau. I will not read all the words of the bill, but there is a director, under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, who may make regulations and decide all disputed questions, make rules and regulations as to the compensation of attorneys, as to proofs and evidence, and as to allowances, allotments, compensation, or insurance, the method of investigations and examinations, and the form of adjudications and awards. Those are the two bureaus, one of marine and seaman's insurance and the other military and naval insurance, each with a commissioner at its head. The bureaus may have deputies, assistants, actuaries, clerks, and employees, use Army and Navy surgeons, have an advisory board on insurance in fixing premium rates and adjusting claims, and witnesses may be subpoenaed and papers proved on oath, with power to enforce the subpoenas in the courts. All this is in the process of adjusting claims, and $100,000 is appropriated for present expenses.

It is a whole new bureau. Our Pension Department has been taking care of appropriations once amounting to $175,000,000, when they were at the highest, for an Army that went up to a million men. How many clerks will be required for an Army that may go up to 5,000,000 men? And how much expenditure will go through that department?

The bureau is not only to take care of pensions, but it is to have full power to grant military and naval insurance, in peace as well as war. It has nothing to do with this war except incidentally. It is a complete system of military and naval insurance for the Armies of the United States. The United States shall sell insurance to any soldier or sailor, not only against death but against total disability, for the sums mentioned—$1,000 to $5,000. The amount was $10,000, but it is now $5,000. Insurance is to be applied for within 120 days after enlistment, or after notice of the terms of insurance under this bill, and every man previously enlisted who is totally disabled or who dies before this time will get $25 a month in 240 installments, or $6,000 altogether, to be paid to him or to his wife, child, or widowed mother.

The director is to publish a form of insurance not attachable or subject to creditors, payable to the spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and also during total disability to the injured person, or to any or all of them, and to such other persons as may be provided from time to time by regulation. It is to be payable only by installment, with ordinary insurance provisions for maturity at certain ages, life or term policies, cash, loan, paid up, and extended values, with the right to change the beneficiaries. This is all applicable to peace as well as war.

The United States is to bear all expenses of administration. The premium rates must be the net rates based upon the American experience table of mortality, with interest at 3½ per cent per annum. That gives more than is given by most insurance companies, for the best of them have reduced the interest to 3 per cent per annum, because that is all they can be sure of getting. Payments of the premium are to be paid monthly, and may be deducted from the pay or deposit of the insurer, or otherwise made at his election.

The United States may be sued. Attorney fees may be allowed as a part of the judgment up to 10 per cent.

Now, so far this is all Government insurance up to $5,000 for any soldier or sailor who applies, with all the complications of the insurance business, and at a flat rate, without any loading, and all these provisions are applicable to peace as well as war.

But by two sections, 403 and 404, the United States bears the expense of the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war, and during the period of war the insurance shall be term insurance, for successive terms of one year each, convertible after the war—though there is nothing left of the policy so far as reserve is concerned—without medical examination, into such form or forms of insurance and such provisions for premium payment as may be prescribed by regulations. All the complications of the insurance business are thus to be dealt with by a bureau down here in Washington.

Why this general insurance scheme? Are we going to have State or Government insurance for the Army and Navy? That ought to have been reported by the Army or Navy Committee as a part of the pay and privileges of the Army or Navy. Is it going to be an insurance bureau for all the people of the United States? Such a bill ought to come from the Judiciary Committee of the House. It has no place in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. But what I do object to about the thing is this—

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am just in the middle of the statement of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Just for a short question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Inasmuch as the estimate of the cost of this bill for the first year is based on $175,000,000, I should like to ask what estimate of casualties was used to make that estimate?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. My recollection is that it was for an army of 250,000 men at the front for six months, and they estimated 75 killed and 50 disabled for each 1,000 men. You will find it stated carefully in my printed views, because I abstracted the testimony on that subject with some care.

These estimates (p. 51) assume an Army of a million men in the first year, family allowances to 40 per cent, averaging $300 per man; that only 250,000 will be in active service; that those men will have deaths of 75 per 1,000 a year, while the reserve will only lose 4 per 1,000; and they estimate that in the second year there will be a million men at the front, and assume that only a quarter of the men will take out insurance at an average of $2,500 each.

Mr. SNYDER. Then it is assumed that the first year we would lose 7½ per cent of the men?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Of 250,000 men only.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I did not want to go into these figures. I did not bring them in.

Mr. ROSE. I should like to give you the exact figures as furnished by a French statistician. I have them here.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Do not read them please, but let us print them in the Record.

Mr. ROSE submits figures furnished by M. Andre Tardieu, the French high commissioner to the United States, of the French losses in per cent:

The battle of the Charleroi and the Marne.....	5.41
First six months of 1915.....	2.39
Second six months of 1915.....	1.68
First six months of 1916.....	1.47
Second six months of 1916.....	1.28
Mr. SNYDER says the first half of 1917 was.....	1.05

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey notes that Americans will emulate the Canadians and be in the dangerous fighting, and that by to-day's paper the Canadian losses are estimated at 23,000 men in the recent advance on Lens.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Beginning again, this insurance business may be in one of two forms. Either everybody may take it if it is advantageous; and if so, the Government had better just give it without cost, whatever would be the amount of the insurance, and be done with it. It would then be a part of the compensation or pension—

Mr. SABATH. Did the gentleman say it would be advantageous to everyone to take it out?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I said, if it would be advantageous; and it would be advantageous for everyone to take it out. But we may go on with the other supposition. It would be advantageous to everyone to take it out, but it would not be very advantageous to the Government, because the losses would be something beyond computation. But if every man ought to take it out, the Government ought not to prefer one over another, but ought to allow a certain amount of insurance to everybody. This requires no new bureau, for this reason, that if the Government allows insurance to everybody, payable in installments, it is nothing but a pension. The Government makes an allowance to every man that is injured in the war. That is not insurance at all. The man does not pay, but the Government does; and it will come under the amendment of the pension laws already mentioned.

It has no place in a bureau with all sorts of queer policies, all sorts of queer arrangements, any number of new officers to weigh down the Government of the United States with all sorts of details, making its accounts unintelligible, even more so than they are at the present time, and adding another bureau instead of letting the pensions be managed through the pension department.

Now, on the other hand, if the soldiers do not take that insurance, great unfairness is created beyond all question. In the first place, the man with a family who has no deposit of his half pay down in Washington, whose half pay is gone to his family, and who wants the other half himself, will not insure. The man without a family, whose deposit is in Washington drawing 4 per cent, will be more likely to allow that to go into insurance to the limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will ask for five minutes more.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. When he dies it is agreed that it can only go to his children, his issue, the wife, or the widowed mother, the brother and sister; and if he has none it will go to the United States. But the bill also says that it shall be paid to such other persons as may be provided for by regulations. Regulations will be made so that he will get the benefit, while the fellow who has a family dependent upon him will not insure.

Now, in the next place, the uncertainty of the administration of this law beats anything known. If you have insurance, if it is against death, you know what you are talking about, but if it is insurance against death or total disability, when it comes to the end of the year and the man is partially disabled and does not know how to get along very well with only a small pension, is he going to pay insurance out of the small pension to the Government and keep it up, or will he let it go and say he can not afford it? When it fails will he come to the Government and say, "You gave $5,000 to the fellows who died or were disabled before the insurance propositions were published; you gave them 240 payments at $25 a month by this very bill; now do the same by me."

The injustices and the legislation that will be required to remedy those injustices are beyond all computation. Then when he comes in afterwards and says he wants another form of insurance and has paid \$8 for one year—that is the rate for one year—if he comes in after the war and wants to insure, shall he pay \$8, \$9, or \$10, or running up to \$70, in old age, or will he take a regular life policy which is \$20 a year? He can do it in any company or with the Government. But think of the details and complications—5,000,000 men in the Army and, say, 2,000,000 taking out insurance—the details of this actuarial work on the part of the Government of the United States so as to give varying forms of term insurance, or 20-payments insurance, or life premium, or any way that the man wants according to the actuarial rule with interest at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, it exceeds all comprehension. It is beyond thought. I do not know whether it is constitutional for the Government of the United States, as a part of the pay of the Army, to provide for obligations which are to become due 50 years hence under the two-year limitation of Army appropriations of the Constitution. We do it under the pension laws because we have to, but as insurance we do not have to, and it is not a thing in which we can engage with any safety.

In my opinion the first section of the bill, which relates to the new bureau, should be stricken out. The second section of the bill, if in proper shape, might be passed leaving out all reference to the bureau and allowing the pensions to be managed by the War or Navy Department. It might better be in a statute such as was passed by the Appropriations Committee for the men on the border. But, at any rate, the family should go to the War Department and get their money without having to file an application in a bureau of the Treasury. I think we ought not to meddle with the rates of the pension statutes until we have further advice from the Pensions Committee. But even if we do this, we should not refer the whole pension business to any new bureau in the Treasury. This whole insurance business ought either to be changed to a plain pension by letting the man pay nothing and giving all an equal show, or else it ought, as I believe it ought to be, struck out of the bill as a delusion, a snare, and a complication which we do not understand and which future Congresses will never understand, and which is susceptible of all the abuses and more that has made insurance companies a hissing and a by-word through the United States in years gone by. [Applause.]

We want to take care of the soldier, and to do that we provide that he get a pension in case of death and disability. We have the pension laws. We must provide that during the service of a married man his family should be taken care of and his children, but let us do it directly and see that the pay and allowance go to the families and not ask them to file a million applications to a new bureau under control of the Secretary of the Treasury, who does not know the facts and has not the machinery to deal with these applications. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print two letters from the presidents of two insurance companies in St. Louis in regard to the bill. They are not criticisms but suggest some changes which they would like to see made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by printing the two letters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

THE MISSOURI STATE LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
St. Louis, August 24, 1917.

HON. JACOB E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to take the liberty of calling to your attention the report submitted by the committee of insurance representatives appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to consider plans for insuring and indemnifying officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy of the United States. This committee consisted of most competent insurance experts and the tentative draft of the bill identified as House bill 5723 or Senate bill 2758 was very carefully considered by them. I believe you will find that all life insurance men are in complete accord with the findings of this committee.

We favor the principles set forth in Articles I, II, and III of the bill. Such criticisms as we have to offer to these articles are in regard to matters of detail which we are confident will disappear before the bill is finally approved in the House and Senate. We are opposed very strongly, however, to the provisions of Article IV as they stand at present; we believe this part of the bill should be eliminated entirely.

Article IV of the bill provides that the Government will grant insurance to each soldier for practically any amount he applies for from $1,000 to $10,000, provided the soldier pays the normal premium of $7 or $8 per thousand, the excess or war loss estimated at $75 per thousand per annum being paid by the Government. Provision is also made for the continuance of this insurance by the Government indefinitely after the war is over.

We are opposed to its provision not as might be supposed because the Government may appear to be infringing on our business but because the optional features of the article will result in most serious discrimination in favor of the men who have the foresight and the means to avail themselves of the privileges conferred by this article to the largest possible extent, while the man who is indifferent to his obligations and opportunities or who has not had the advantages of the provisions of this article pointed out to him in a sufficiently careful manner will be in the same position as if this article were not incorporated in the bill. He and his dependents will have to rely entirely on the benefits conferred by the first three articles of the bill.

If Congress deems it advisable to enact some law along the lines of Article IV then we urge that its most objectionable features be removed by providing that each individual in the service receive the same amount of insurance, whether that be $1,000 or $10,000, and that the whole cost of the insurance be furnished by the Government. By so doing discrimination will be eliminated and speculation upon the lives of the soldiers by persons who have either only a remote interest or no interest therein will be prevented.

The expense of maintaining a department for the collection and proper accounting of premiums, for the computation of the reserves and for all other details incidental to the conduct of a life insurance business will be eliminated.

We would further urge that the measure, being a war emergency measure, should provide for its discontinuance at the close of the war or within a reasonable time thereafter, say one year, thus obviating the necessity of the Government going into the life insurance business permanently. There is no need or demand on the part of the public that the Government enter the life insurance business permanently, and it has been demonstrated by experience, both in this country in the State of Wisconsin and abroad in Italy, that publicly administered life insurance is not a success.

Anything that the Government does to encourage life insurance and to place its advantages before the public is beneficial to our business so that from the standpoint of a life insurance man I would favor Article IV, provided the objectionable features referred to can be eliminated. If the compensation and benefits provided by the first three articles of the draft bill are not sufficient in the opinion of Congress, then the amounts of these benefits can be readily increased or an additional flat sum of, say, $1,000 or any larger amount can be paid in the event of the death of the soldier either during the war or within a stipulated period after its close.

Anything which you can do to remove from this bill the objectionable features of article 4 will be greatly appreciated by me.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN G. HOYT, President.

THE GERMAN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
St. Louis, Mo., August 24, 1917.

HON. JACOB E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully call your attention to House bill No. 5723 and Senate bill No. 2758, which are under consideration by Congress.

A careful reading of the bill convinces us that Article IV thereof ought to be eliminated. The following-mentioned considerations are the basis for this conclusion:

(1) By section 403 the expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazard of war are placed upon the Government, the premium rates being prescribed to be the net rates based upon the American experience table of mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

The expenses of administration and the cost of the extra hazard will be very great, and is an additional benefit to those provided for by Articles II and III. The payment of this gratuity to those who are risking their lives for their country might not be open to criticism, if it applied to all alike and were put upon the basis of military service. When, however, the financial ability of the soldier is made the basis of his sharing in the benefit created by this great cost to the Government, a wrong results not only to the taxpayers, but to the soldier whose financial means may not permit him to purchase any or as much of such insurance as his brother in arms who is in better financial circumstances. If the benefits provided for by Articles II and III are insufficient, it would seem to us far more equitable to expend the great amount of cost and expense, which the plan provided for by Article IV would entail, in increasing the amount of such benefits. In that way there would be an equitable distribution. The particular point we desire to make here is, that the right to participate in the gratuity, represented by the expenses of administration and the cost of the extra hazard, is a matter of purchase.

The character of service to the country in no wise enters into it. The man who is insured for $10,000 gets ten times as much benefit out of the gratuity as does the man insured for $1,000, and the man who carries no policy does not share therein at all, although the service rendered by him to his country may be of far greater value than that of his wealthier messmate. It makes money and not service the basis of reward. This is clearly wrong in principle.

(2) It is provided in section 404 that after the war the insurance may be converted into such form or forms of insurance as may be prescribed by regulations. Thus the Government is required to continue in the life-insurance business after the war, although without further enabling legislation it can not write any new risks. The only excuse for the Government providing insurance would be that the private insurance companies could not insure against the extra hazard of the war for a premium which the average soldier could afford to pay. The necessity for the Government stepping in and assuming a considerable part of the cost of insurance, as is contemplated by this bill, in order that it may be possible for more men in the service to carry insurance would end with the war. And that necessity should prescribe the termination of the Government's insurance business.

(3) Under the plan provided for by Article IV it is possible for the soldier of means to secure a policy for as much as $10,000, while his comrade, with probably a family dependent upon him, may not be able to pay the premium upon $1,000. This creates a class distinction which is repugnant to our democratic institutions.

(4) The allowances provided by Article II and the provisions for compensation for disability and death in Article III would seem to be sufficiently generous and to make Article IV unnecessary.

(5) The furnishing of insurance at less than cost by the Government creates unfair competition with the established life insurance companies. The offer of the Government will undoubtedly cause great lapsation and untold demands for cash-surrender values and thus undermine the insurance business, thereby prejudicing the insurance of the civilian policyholders. The premium rates are below the cost of insurance, and no insurance corporation or fraternal beneficial society will be able to meet them.

We make no objection to Articles II and III, but, on the contrary, consider them highly commendable. Article IV can be eliminated without in any way affecting the provisions of Articles II and III, and we respectfully request your active opposition to Article IV.

Yours, very truly,

N. GUERDAN, President.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill, and shall speak more in detail about it when it comes up under the five-minute rule. But I want at this time to call to the attention of the committee a serious condition that prevails throughout the country: There are some men in various sections who are sowing the seeds of sedition and treason among the American people. They willfully and maliciously misrepresent the attitude of our Government in this war. Therefore I am glad to learn that the Department of Justice has reached out its arm and is going to suppress such sedition and treason wherever it attempts to raise its treacherous head. [Applause.] It has been done by other chief magistrates in other times in our country's history, and it is well that the snake is being crushed at the very outset of this struggle. To me this war is being fought by this country for a great principle, namely, the right under international law to sail the seas untrammelled. It is the fourth time in our comparatively brief history that we have unfurled our battle flag to defend this right. In the early part of our history as a Nation, in 1798—in fact, before we were 10 years old, before we had passed the first decade of our national life—we broke off our diplomatic relations with France—with France, that had been our ally in the Revolution, France that had lent us aid and comfort and assistance in obtaining our liberty, our freedom. But subsequently France interfered, and for some years continued to interfere, with our rights upon the high seas. The Congress of the United States, after many efforts had been made to settle the matter peacefully, voted to break off all diplomatic intercourse with our former friend and promptly created the Navy Department. Up to that time the War Department had also been holding jurisdiction over our Navy.

A Secretary of the Navy was appointed. Congress immediately appropriated the money for that great line of American frigates of which "Old Ironsides"—the Constitution—was such a glorious type, and which brought honor and renown to our country. The Congress also created forthwith the grade of lieutenant general in the Army of the United States. Washington was nominated and appointed to command the Army. He was then in retirement on his farm at Mount Vernon. The Secretary of War himself brought the commission to Washington at that place. He found the foremost American in his fields looking after his crops. He explained to Gen. Washington the purpose of his visit. And then Washington uttered a sentiment which I hope may be indelibly written upon the memory of every American boy and girl. "I am ready," he said, "for any service that I can give to my country." [Applause.] He accepted the trust and I believe took command of the American Army at Alexandria, Va. But France soon came to terms and acknowledged our right to the absolute freedom of the seas. Many Members of the House will recall that the French spoliation claims, about which we are called upon to legislate every now and then, were caused by the attitude of France from 1793 to 1799. That early show of force and determination to assert our rights on the part of the young Republic, while many of the heroes of the Revolutionary War were still alive, compelled France to come to terms and she ceased to seize or destroy our ships and our cargoes. She unequivocally recognized our right to sail the seas everywhere under international law.

In 1812 we fought the second war with England on account of her interference with our rights upon the seas. We had negotiated this question with her, or tried to negotiate it, for many years. And I may add, parenthetically, that this country of ours has always been slow to enter into quarrel with other nations. We invariably tried to follow a policy of forbearance so long as forbearance seemed possible. But finally, when things became unendurable, we had to let loose our dogs of war. I do not think it is necessary to go into the story of the War of 1812 at any great length at this time. But it was fought with England to maintain and protect and preserve our rights upon the high seas.

In 1815 we went into the third contest on account of our determination to insist upon and enforce these rights. The Barbary pirates had been exacting tribute from all the maritime nations of the earth up to that time. We paid tribute along with England, France, and the other great ocean-carrying powers, but the Corsairs of the Mediterranean continued to hamper our ships and shipping. Then in 1815 President Madison sent Commodore Stephen Decatur with a fleet of American ships into the Mediterranean. We whipped the Algerians and the Tripolitans; and they finally made a treaty of peace with us, under the terms of which they acknowledged our absolute right to sail the seas of the world unconditionally, without the necessity of paying a single dollar of tribute. [Applause.]

Incidentally, in making that war, just as incidentally in making this war, we fought for the rights of mankind and humanity. For before the year 1821 had passed every other maritime nation of the world—France being the last to make her treaty with the pirates—had made treaties similar to our own and ceased paying tribute for the right to sail the seas. And for 102 years the rights of this country to sail American ships in any waters where under international law they had the right to go was never questioned. And then the Imperial Government of Germany again challenged these rights. A number of American ships were sunk after the present European war broke out. The lives of American citizens were continually being destroyed by German submarines in violation of all the rules of civilized warfare. The President of the United States, following the traditions of this Nation, had repeatedly protested and objected to the illegal attitude of the Imperial Government of Germany toward our citizens and our ships. Germany, after every protest, promised to ameliorate conditions. With every promise the people of the United States breathed a hope that we would be able to weather the storm and that we would still be able to maintain peace. At last, like a bolt of lightning from a clear sky, we learned to our amazement that our protests were being treated with scorn and contempt. On the 31st of January of this year the Imperial Government of Germany informed the President that on the very next day, on the 1st of February, the German submarines would ruthlessly sink every American ship found within certain designated areas of the Atlantic Ocean. We had an absolute right in those areas. To have accepted that dictation, to have accepted that proposition would have meant the surrender of American sovereignty on the high seas. [Applause.]

It would have meant that we were willing to haul down "the Stars and Stripes" and hoist the white flag of surrender in their stead. And no red-blooded American, I hope, will ever be willing to surrender his country's rights—rights that other Americans in other days have fought and bled and died to maintain inviolate. [Applause.] If we had acquiesced in that doctrine on the Atlantic, probably some day in the Pacific, when other nations might be at war there, and we should attempt to maintain a neutral attitude, some of those nations would tell us to keep off this or that part of the Pacific Ocean; and, having surrendered our rights in this instance, we would have set a precedent which many of the pacifists of this country would insist that we ought to follow for all times. I am unwilling for my country ever to be placed in that attitude or that she should ever consent to take such a degraded position. [Applause.]

Ah, many women of the country feel their heartstrings torn because their boys are going to the war.

It is a sad thing, indeed, to think that parents should raise their boys only to lose them soon after they arrive at man's estate in fighting for their country. I do not blame the women for feeling sadly about it. I do not wonder at their aching hearts. But I want to recall to them that if the mothers of 1776, if the mothers of 1812, and if the mothers of 1861 had not been willing to sacrifice their boys in those days of trial and struggle, I do not know whether we of to-day would be enjoying all of the blessings of freedom and liberty which this country extends to the humblest of its citizens. [Applause.]

And so in every age, and at all times and at all hazards, the American citizen must be ready to defend with life itself, if need be, the liberty, the freedom that has come down to us.

For myself, I believe this is going to be a long, bloody, and terrible war. I am not trying to delude myself into the belief that some miracle is going to happen before we fairly get into the struggle that will end it all. I wish to God that it were so. But I look for a long and terrible conflict. I feel that the armies that are now forming are but the beginning of things. I believe that the greatest mistake the autocracy of Germany ever made was when it minimized the courage and the determination of this country to maintain all of its rights unimpaired. [Applause.] I believe that before the German autocrats are many months older they will realize what they did when they forced this country into the war. And the German people, too, will ultimately realize what was done by their stubborn and autocratic Government in forcing this great American Republic, which wanted to hold aloof, into this war.

And, my colleagues, I believe that before many months are over the patriotic sentiment of this country will assert itself in such tones that they will penetrate even in the darkest recesses of the deepest German forests. I feel assured that victory, yes, victory overwhelming and complete, will come to us in this struggle. [Applause.] I feel that the people of the United States begin to understand what we have at stake. I feel that the men who are attempting to spread seeds of discontent, of treason, of sedition, will be called to account by the civil authorities in every State and in every section of the Union. Already in a number of the States the governors have asserted themselves. They will do so more frequently in the future.

I want to read to you from the lamented Lincoln what he had to say about the "wily agitators" who tried to breed discontent at home during our great Civil War. This quotation is from a letter which he addressed to Erastus Corning and others on the 12th of June, 1863. They had sent him a resolution protesting against his taking Vallandigham, who had been a former Member of Congress, and who was preaching sedition in the North, and sending him across the Union lines into the lines of the Southern Confederacy. These gentlemen wrote President Lincoln a protest, to which he replied in part:

Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert? This is none the less injurious when effected by getting a father or brother or friend into a public meeting and there working upon his feelings till he is persuaded to write the soldier boy that he is fighting in a bad cause for a wicked administration of a contemptible Government, too weak to arrest and punish him if he shall desert. I think that in such a case to silence the agitator and save the boy is not only constitutional but withal a great mercy.

[Loud applause.]

I hope that our treacherous agitators will be dealt with in that spirit. [Applause.] I hope they will be put down as they should be put down, and I have no fear but that this country will once again show the world that American rights and American honor must not be trampled upon, but that they will be protected by the overwhelming might of a great and free people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat I want to ask him what he thinks of the pending bill.

Mr. KAHN. I shall support the pending bill, and when it comes up for discussion under the five-minute rule I shall take pleasure in saying a few words in addition to these remarks. And, although I had intended to take a vacation next week, I shall be here for the first day or two, in order to participate with the committee in the consideration and passage of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would not take even this short time of the committee, and especially following the eloquent appeal to our patriotism of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], were it not for the fact that when this bill is finally considered I may not be present, owing to other duties.

I do not believe anyone would accuse me of not wishing to give to the man who fights the battles of his country every help and every encouragement. I have worked at times, some people may think, too industriously for pensions under our present system, but I have no apology to make for that. I am not one of those who see in our present system of pensions one beset with graft and politics. Neither am I one who would care to stand before you or the public and defend all of the inequalities in our present system. I have no sympathy with the so-called uplifters, who have never had any military experience or who have never felt the need of any of this assistance of the Government, who are eternally talking about the "disgraceful pension system of our Government." I recognize, however, that there are inequalities in it. I, on the other hand, do not believe the charge that it has political and partisanship bias. I believe I can say, and I think probably all the Members of this House can say, that every case which needs attention in the Pension Department or before our Pension Committees always has our very best attention, whether we know the political bias of or party to which the petitioner belongs or not.

I have had several pension bills passed. I have tried to help get many others passed and many pensions increased, but I can frankly say that I could not tell you now the political opinions held by any of the beneficiaries of these acts on my part. What we want to consider in this legislation, as I take it, is the fact that we are trying to do something now to take care of a situation which does not now exist and which we do not know how it will present itself to us when it does exist. We are attempting to displace our present system of pensions by this new legislation.

I think it is a mistake to put any part of the administration of this pension system in the hands of the Treasury Department for more reasons than one. First, it would tend to build up out of the Treasury Department a greater and more powerful political machine than it is to-day. Second, it would be establishing a new department which is not necessary, because the provisions embraced within this bill can be best administered by our existing organizations which are already in the Government service. [Applause.]

In attempting this legislation let us take into consideration the fact that we are not going into this present war as we went into any of our former wars. There never was before such preparation for war as is being made by this great Nation of ours to-day. In every previous conflict in which we have been engaged, before this much time had elapsed after the declaration of war hundreds and thousands of our men had been in the field and on the battle line, and had been subjected to the test of battle. We are not going into it in that way now. Let us not try to do too much for the future just at present, because, let me say here and now, the men who are going to fight this war, the men who will compose these armies, these millions of young men, will in 3 or 5 or 10 years from now, when the situation arises that is contemplated to be met by this legislation, be here influencing the legislation which they will think necessary, not only the legislation for pensions but as to the whole future policy of our Government.

I think it is right and proper that we should leave those matters to them. We can not, sitting here in cold blood, expect to be able scientifically to pay off in dollars and cents the debts that we shall owe to the soldiers of our country. We never can do that. Let us look at the situation as we see it to-day and content ourselves with taking care of the men while they are at the front and while their dependent families may need help. It is all right to do that, but we can not incorporate in this bill all the provisions that may be advisable regarding the amount of pensions to be paid later.

What we can well do now is to provide for the administration, either by the War Department or otherwise, of a fund to take care of the present emergency, and trust to the future to take care of the rest.

Now, I was not one of those who were enthusiastic about increasing the pay of the enlisted men of the Army. It was not because I did not think we owed them more money and more help. It was for an entirely different reason. My experience with men while they are in the service, and especially in the active service, has been that they have very little need of much money. If, by the provisions of this bill, you can divide that pay which you have increased, and make it a sort of savings fund or trust fund for these men when they are through with their active service, I would be cordially in sympathy with that. In fact, I think our whole system of gratuities and pensions to soldiers and sailors is one of sympathy to our fellow men. The amount we should pay can not be calculated to a nicety. It can not be done along very scientific lines. I am in favor of that part of this legislation, but when you provide in this bill a pension for the widow of one of these men almost double the amount of pension heretofore granted to the widow of the soldier of any other war, do we not make a mistake? How can we explain to the widow of a soldier of the Civil War who has raised her little family on $12 a month or perhaps $10 a month, with $2 additional for each of the children, or how can you explain to the widow of the Spanish-American War veteran, who in a few instances has obtained $12 a month, the fact that here you are providing $30 a month for the widow and an additional allowance for the children? How can you explain the provisions of this bill under those circumstances? How can you explain it to the thousands of men of 1898 who went into the Spanish-American War, as vigorous and strong physically as any young men could possibly be, and who are now so disabled that they are unable to earn a livelihood as the result of service in fever camps and in active campaigns in the Tropics?

Can you account for the difference between your treatment of them and your proposed treatment of the present Army by the fact that there were relatively few of them, while there are millions of these? Physically their service and experience were the same with them as if there had been an army of many millions of men.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Is it not a fact that the dollar of to-day was about 25 cents at that time?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; but the widows of the Civil War and the widows of the Spanish-American War are getting that same dollar.

As I said before, in all our former wars we have taken our soldiers directly from civil life and with but little preparation put them in the field, and as a result of that system we have been compelled to pay what some people may think exorbitant sums in the way of pensions; but when you consider the lack of preparation and the losses we have been compelled to sustain by reason of the fact that our soldiers were not trained and disciplined for the service the amount paid for pensions is not to be wondered at.

It may be interesting to know the amounts which have been paid in pensions as a result of our former wars. The following table includes the amount paid up to and including June 30, 1916:

War of the Revolution (estimated).....	$70,000,000.00
War of 1912 (service pension).....	45,991,743.76
Indian wars (service pension).....	13,790,299.13
War with Mexico (service pension).....	50,422,229.22
Civil War.....	4,765,075,020.92
War with Spain and Philippine insurrection.....	53,744,667.55
Regular Establishment.....	39,098,319.01
Unclassified.....	16,508,447.41
Total.....	5,054,630,667.00

These figures do not seem so large to us these days, when we are spending such vast sums on the preparation for service and when we are advancing to our allies the amounts necessary to maintain their armies in the field.

While at times mistakes may have been made in the administration of our pension system, and in all probability many beneficial changes can be made in that system, we as a Nation should be proud of the fact that we have been able to pay to the men who have gone out to fight our battles and to those they have left behind them such an amount of money as to enable them to live more comfortably and their dependents to feel less keenly the loss of the one whose labor and industry would have contributed to their comfort and support.

We are now preparing to place in the field the greatest Army our country has ever called to face a foe. How much service this Army may see can not now be estimated. A part of that preparation will be a wise provision to care for the families of the men who enter the Army, to care for these men themselves while they are in the field; but I trust that any legislation we may enact now may be such as will not cause the men of our former wars to think that they have not been treated justly.

Do you think we should legislate here and now to cover the future as it will be unfolded to us by this great conflict? It would be a mistake to attempt it, in my opinion, because the men who are waging this conflict will shape that legislation as they think best when they return home and rejoin the citizenship of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I should not take the time of the committee with remarks on this bill if it were not for the fact that the bill seems to me to need constructive criticism. I got a copy of the bill last week and took it home with me, and took the printed hearings with me, and the report, and on first reading the bill I was very favorably impressed with it. It seemed to me a very good bill in many respects. I like particularly the provision for depositing at 4 per cent half of the soldier's pay, so that he can not "blow it all in" to his own harm. But the further I went into it, and the further I went into the hearings, the more doubt I got into, and now I am in a position where if I had to vote on the bill to-night I think I should vote against it, although I am a very strong believer in the righteousness and the necessity of the war and would very much regret to vote against any measure considered necessary for its prosecution. But it does not seem to me that it will do to make the discriminations that are made in this bill. It does not seem to me that it will do, 20 years after this war is over, to have two men, both disabled to the same degree, one of them drawing a pension or insurance installment from the Government and the other not drawing any. The one would say to the other, "Why, you are getting something and I am not getting anything." The other would reply, "You did not know enough to apply for insurance and let them take 66 cents a month out of your pay when you were in the Army." I do not believe that will do. I do not believe we ought to pass a bill of that kind. If we do leave this insurance section in it, the premium ought to be made an even dollar a month. Everybody can understand that. The bill says:

The premium rates shall be the net rates based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

You will have to have agents going around among the soldiers to explain to them what that means. If you put in there that it should be $1 per month, everybody would understand it, and you could get four times as many men to take insurance, and the Government would get $4 a year more, and the whole thing would work better if it is to be retained in the bill. That is the psychology of selling insurance.

There is another thing I do not like at all, and that is that this insurance is supposed to be applied for within 120 days, or four months after enlistment. Why, it will take more than that time for a great many of the soldiers to understand what this is about. Lots of these men who are going into the Army hardly know how to speak the English language. Most of them never saw or heard of insurance, and they will not understand this thing within four months unless some one comes to every man individually and explains it to him, just as a life insurance agent does. That will not be done, and it is impossible for it to be done.

There are some other things on which I am looking for information that I do not find in the report or hearings. In Article II, with regard to allotments to a wife and so forth, I would like to know to whom this bill applies anyway. As a matter of actual fact, under the draft act we are not drawing anybody into the Army who has dependents. If a drafted man makes a claim for exemption and it goes before the local board or before the district board, it is judicially determined that he has no dependents before he is accepted. It is determined that nobody is dependent on him. Now, I should like to have somebody explain to me how he can come in later and claim that he has dependents. Will not the determination of the board which turned down his appeal have absolute weight with the bureau of insurance, knowing as everybody does who has had business with the Pension Bureau or with any other bureau, that every Government clerk is here in Washington for the purpose of doing a man out of an honest dollar if he can? These Government bureaus of red tapers here in Washington never let a man have a cent if they can keep it away from him. That is true in the Pension Bureau and in every other bureau. I do not believe anybody can get anything out of this section of the bill except a very few men. The statement that family allotments will go to 40 per cent of the men seems to me far too high. Some of the older sergeants and some men in the ranks in the old Regular Army, stationed around at the garrisons, and at Army posts, and so forth, are married, and some of the noncommissioned officers in the militia are married, but the married men in the National Guard were all discharged, even if they did not want to be in most cases, except a few sergeants. There may have been some States where the orders were not obeyed, but in my section of the country—and Col. Crago tells me that in Pennsylvania—they were all discharged, excepting a few sergeants. They have no dependents in the sense that this bill apparently applies to.

It appears to me that the bill was made to read like a liberal bill, but it does not apply to anybody except the officers and very few of the older men in the Regular Army. There is too much camouflage about it. It does not apply to any drafted man for they have all been judicially determined not to have dependents. When a married man whose wife is not dependent upon him is drafted into the ranks without being exempted, does it apply to him? I can not make out whether it does or not. Suppose a man is drafted whose wife is not dependent upon him but he afterwards loses his property and she becomes a dependent. Can he have any privilege under the bill? Apparently he must have made an allotment and must have had it supplemented by a family allowance if his family is to receive compensation when he is killed. He may lose his property from the very fact that he is in the war and away from his business, but his family seems to be foreclosed from getting anything under it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What is there in the bill to foreclose it?

Mr. PLATT. He has to make an application within a certain period.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is for the insurance.

Mr. PLATT. That is true of the rest of it, is it not?

Mr. ROSE. He has to do it within two years.

Mr. PLATT. He has to certify that they are dependent upon him before the application is made. Suppose they do not become dependent until long after his enlistment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then he can make the application.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose he gets killed in action and has never known of the dependence of his family. I may not understand the bill fully, though I have studied it considerably. It seems to me that it needs a good deal of amendment. I think the criticisms made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] are many of them well taken. The administration of such relief as is proposed in the first part should be given to the War and Navy Departments and the rest of it to the Pension Bureau.

We certainly ought not to pass this bill in a hurry simply because a chancellor of the exchequer, who is not responsible to Congress, asks us to. We should debate it thoroughly and amend it where it needs amending, instead of abrogating all our constitutional duties to the Executive and to the Senate.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, experience has very clearly shown that the old pension system is unscientific and inequitable and does not meet present-day conditions fairly and justly. By it we have seen one man who served only a few days in defense of his country, without having fired a gun or incurred a risk, and may be worth thousands of dollars, in after years be rewarded with a liberal pension, while another who incurred the risks of war for years, and was wounded in the service, and who may be poor and needy, was rewarded with a very small pension.

There can be no reasonable argument advanced against the obligation on the part of the Government to reward those who have risked their lives in defense of the flag and for the protection of the Nation's honor.

We are now engaged in the most titanic struggle the world has ever witnessed—a war not only for the protection of the lives and property of our citizens and the defense of our own land and our national honor, but for the rights and liberties of mankind. To win it we have pledged the resources of the Nation. We have drafted men into the military service through a law that places equal obligation upon all men between certain ages.

The men who will fight our battles in this war are as brave and patriotic as ever marched under the Stars and Stripes to the strains of martial music. Many of them have gone voluntarily, leaving dependent relatives back home. They are all prompted by a patriotic sense of duty, without thought of the risks and hazards of modern warfare that they will incur.

In addition to providing for allotments to the dependent families of the soldier boys, this bill opens the way for them to take out insurance against the risks of warfare and the policies afford protection in case of injury or death. The soldier is assured of compensation in case of injury and his dependents are provided for in case of his death. And, while the premiums charged by those insurance companies that now write policies on the lives of soldiers are so high as to be prohibitive, the premiums to be charged under this bill will be no higher than in times of peace.

Only a short time ago we passed a law compelling the masters of ships to insure the lives of their crews against submarine attacks and other dangers incident to travel on the high seas during this war. That bill passed practically unanimously; and if it were right that we should compel the employer to insure the lives of the men who man his ships, certainly it is not only right but it is the duty of the Government to insure the lives of the soldier boys who are in a way employees of the Government and are fighting for its protection and honor.

For my part, I am in favor of every kind of legislation that will provide, as far as possible, for the safety and comfort of these soldier boys and mitigate the suffering and sorrow of their loved ones. Knowing that their dependents are provided for, that they themselves are assured of compensation in case of injury, and that their loved ones will be protected in case of their death, these boys can go to the front with their minds relieved of that worry and anxiety that they would be unable to dispel if this assurance were lacking. It will make for the better morale of the American Army and will be to them both stimulating and inspiring.

I am glad to be able to give this bill my hearty approval, as I have all other legislation that will ameliorate the suffering of our people and mean the successful prosecution of this war.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will not the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLAYPOOL].

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. CLAYPOOL. On culture along educational lines.

Mr. WALSH. In connection with this bill?

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5723, to establish a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEA of California, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. BANKHEAD, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DOUGHTON, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a letter from the secretary of the Hon. EBENEZER HILL, of Connecticut, asking for indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness. Without objection, the leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, transmitting tentative draft of legislation for insertion in the pending urgent deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 359), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 139), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1720) to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 140), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5833) granting six months' pay to Ida Cottrell Hodgson, widow of Frederick Grady Hodgson, deceased, colonel, United States Army, retired, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 138), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 5975) to provide for the promotion of physical culture, to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of physical culture, and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 5976) to regulate solicitation of funds for war aid and war charity; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 148) prescribing conditions of promotion of officers of the Regular Army below the rank of colonel; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DENT: Resolution (H. Res. 134) providing for an investigation of the Ordnance Department of the War Department; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 5977) granting an increase of pension to Richard H. Stinemates; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 5978) granting an increase of pension to Silas Waters; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSS: A bill (H. R. 5979) granting a pension to Ray H. Schumaker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HASTINGS: A bill (H. R. 5980) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Brown; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. IRELAND: A bill (H. R. 5981) granting an increase of pension to John W. Rawley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5982) granting an increase of pension to Johnson Schenck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5983) granting a pension to Mary Boyd; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5984) for the relief of James Hayden; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 5985) granting an increase of pension to Ruth Evelyn Martin Thomas; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROWLAND: A bill (H. R. 5986) granting an increase of pension to Henrietta Woods; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SELLS: A bill (H. R. 5987) granting a pension to Florence Louisa Fair; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Memorial of Newark (Ohio) Branch of Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, favoring passage of the Alexander bill, House bill 5723; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BROWNING: Petition of residents of Salem, N. J., favoring enactment into law of the purple cross bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of Socialist Party, Camden, N. J., protesting against lack of protection by the Butte authorities of Frank Little, an organizer of the Industrial Workers of the World; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of the International Typographical Union, in session at Colorado Springs, Colo., urging measures to fix reasonable selling prices on all forms of paper supplies, and opposing the imposition of any additional burden upon the printing industry of the United States through increase of postage on publications of any kind; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DRUKKER: Memorial of New Jersey State Federation of Labor, opposing national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of the International Typographical Union, in session at Colorado Springs, Colo., urging measures to fix reasonable selling prices on all forms of paper supplies and opposing the imposition of any additional burden upon the printing industry of the United States through increase of postage on publications of any kind; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Petition of the Ideal Council, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Elizabeth, Pa., favoring passage of the purple cross bill, House bill 5410; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the Walurba Council, No. 859, Fraternal Patriotic Americans, Pitcairn, Pa., favoring the passage of Senate joint resolution No. 84; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TAGUE: Petition of the International Typographical Union, in session at Colorado Springs, Colo., urging measures to fix reasonable selling prices on all forms of paper supplies and opposing the imposition of any additional tax burden upon the printing industries of the United States through the increase of postage on publications of any kind; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Petitions of Chapter F, P. E. O., of Bismarck, and Chapter B, P. E. O., of Dickinson, N. Dak., urging creation of zones around military camps for protection of soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, September 8, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Husting	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Calder	James	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Coit	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Stone
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kendrick	Polindexter	Swanson
Fernald	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thompson
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Trammell
France	Kirby	Robinson	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Sauisbury	Wadsworth
Gerry	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Hale	McKellar	Sherman
Hardwick	McNary	Shields
Hollis	Martin	Simmons

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained on important public business.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHILAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 116) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARDWICK:

A bill (S. 2852) to increase the limit of cost of the Federal building and site therefor at Moultrie, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2853) granting a pension to Thompson M. Hollobaugh, to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2854) to amend the naturalization laws; to the Committee on Immigration.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the entry of distilled spirits into bonded warehouses under bond, conditioned for the export of such distilled spirits to some foreign country within three years from the date of entry into the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I wish to state briefly why I am opposed to any higher taxation than is imposed by the pending bill, known as the Finance Committee's substitute. I think this bill goes to the very limit of safety.

Revenue is raised by taxes and bonds, and the important question here presented is what percentage of the revenue required should be raised by taxes and what percentage by bonds. This is a fundamental question, because it underlies the business prosperity of the country and the credit of the Government. It may be conceded that it is better to pay as you go, but the question still remains, How far can you pay as you go without an industrial collapse and without impairing the credit of the Government? The war may last several years longer, and we may have to resort to increased taxation next year. How can we do this if our industries are crippled and business depressed by too heavy taxes levied this year? The sums raised to carry on this war are of such magnitude that other wars afford a very imperfect guide in the solution of this taxation problem. The best and safest guide which we now have is the experience of England, France, and Germany during the past three years, and our country may well profit by their experience. These nations have levied the highest direct taxation which they believed to be safe. In other words, they have solved the problem of determining the amount of revenue which can be raised by taxation without unduly disturbing the business of the country or the credit of the Government.

Based on appropriations made and to be made, the amount of revenue to be raised by taxes and by bonds during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, as given by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], is $11,775,583,107.11, and the amount of revenue to be collected is $4,158,500,000, of which $2,500,000,000 will be raised by the pending bill; and this leaves $7,617,083,107.11 to be raised by bonds. In other words, the total to be raised by direct taxation is $4,158,500,000, and the total to be raised by bond issue is $7,617,083,107.11. The result is that the percentage to be raised by direct taxation is 35%, and the percentage to be raised by bond issue is 64%. As compared with 35% per cent in this country, the percentage raised by direct taxation in England is only 26 per cent; in France only 14½ per cent; in Germany only 14½ per cent; and in Canada only 8 per cent.

It thus appears that we propose in the first year of the war to raise by direct taxation 9 per cent more than England during the third year of the war, 21 per cent more than France or Germany, and 27 per cent more than Canada. It will be observed that while we have largely added to the percentage adopted by England, we have more than doubled the percentages of France and Germany, and we have increased by more than fourfold the percentage of Canada. In the management of revenue and finance no nation ranks higher than England, and it might therefore be seriously contended that it would not be prudent for this country to exceed her rate of 26 per cent. But however this may be, it certainly can not be said, in view of the experience of England, France, and Germany, that it would be safe for this country to increase the percentage of taxation beyond 35% per cent.

Let us now turn for a moment to the income tax. If this bill passes, the income tax in the United States will be from 3 to 67 per cent, while the income tax in England is from 11½ to 45 per cent, in France from 1 to 10 per cent, and in Germany from fifty-seven one-hundredths to 50 per cent. It is estimated that our income tax will be more than the combined income taxes of England and France or of Germany and France.

As to the war-profits tax, if this bill passes, the United States will levy a graduated tax of from 12 per cent to 60 per cent, while England during the third year of the war levies a tax of 80 per cent and France 50 per cent. The statistics of Germany are not available in a form which can be clearly stated. In comparing the war-profits tax of this country with England and France it must be borne in mind that the exemptions are greater in those countries than in the United States. Nor must we forget in this connection that business in England during the three years' prewar period was far above normal, while business in the United States was below normal, and that this fact has a distinct bearing on the actual rate of war-profits tax. It is also true that England postponed the levy of this high tax until the third year of the war. These considerations show that the conditions under which the war-profits tax was assessed in England are quite different from the conditions which prevail in this country.

There is another consideration which has an important bearing on this subject. In England the industries are stabilized, while in this newer country we are passing through a period of expansion. Reflect for a moment on the vast expansion of our industries which has taken place during the war and which is bound to continue if business is not crippled. Consider also the immense orders which the Government is issuing in connection with our war preparations, such as the equipment of our Army and Navy and the building of ships. This situation necessitates the employment of a large amount of new capital every year, and this capital can not with safety be as extensively drawn upon by a war-profits tax as in England.

Let us also bear in mind that in framing an income tax and a war-profits tax if these burdens are too heavy it will seriously interfere with the floating of our bonds.

No one can predict the effect which the pending bill will have upon the business of the country. Judging from the experience of England, France, and Germany, who have gone to the limit of taxation, the high taxation imposed by the pending bill may cause a marked disturbance in the general business of the country. Under these circumstances we certainly should not increase this danger by imposing additional taxes. Let us act as prudent men. Let us remember that taxation is not a matter of rhetoric or of feeling or of prejudice against wealth or of social reform, but a plain business matter of the most vital importance. Let us not jeopardize the Nation's financial standing in this hour of peril. Let us not cripple or destroy the very industries which produce the money to pay the taxes. The hope of winning this war depends upon our financial and industrial strength, and we must run no risk of impairing that strength by excessive taxation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no fear that we are not well within the line of safety in tax levies, appropriations, and bond issues. If the increases had not been made, not in a very remarkable degree it is true, of the income taxes embodied in the Gerry amendment I should have voted even for a larger addition to those income taxes than that. The Gerry amendment having been adopted, however, I am disposed for the present to let the income-tax features, so far as I have a vote on the matter, remain upon the present basis.

I voted against any larger taxation of war profits or excess profits. If the amendments reported by the committee had not made the addition thereafter embodied in the committee amendment I should have voted likewise for an increase over the recommendations of the committee as originally reported to the Senate.

The committee itself, however, or those responsible and speaking for the committee, made an addition which, as the chairman of the committee properly denominated it, was a composite addition made up of both war profits and excess profits. That increase thereafter adopted by the Senate aggregated nearly one-half billion dollars, in round figures; those two increases, that of the income tax—coupled with the excess profits tax making a considerable increase of upward of one-half billion dollars to that originally reported by the committee of some $2,000,000,000 I believe are sufficient. It will make under this tax bill an annual levy of two and a half billion dollars. This for the present, as I look at matters of that kind, is all that can be safely levied under the present bill.

The entire money in circulation in the United States approximates $5,000,000,000. In 12 months one-half of the total circulating medium of the country will be taken by the Government in taxes by this bill. If we went beyond this, it might result under this bill in a segregation of too much of the current money of the United States in the form of taxes taken within a 12-month period. There is not an end of taxing when this bill shall have been passed; the tax power still remains in Congress, to be exercised according to future emergencies. So, if those emergencies require other additions and tax levies, incomes, and excess profits, together with war profits, are still sources of revenue open to the taxing power of Congress. Income taxes can be regarded for those future emergencies as a reserve, to be drawn on to meet those emergencies as they shall arise. If greater future taxation of war profits shall be necessary that, too, is a resource to be drawn upon to meet all contingencies that may from time to time arise.

One thing that very powerfully influenced me to vote against the increase in the tax on profits accruing from war business was the present basis of assessing those profits. It was stated, and correctly so, that England is taking 80 per cent of what they consider war profits in that country. They begin, however, with a very much higher exemption than do we; not an exemption made in the statutes, but an exemption, in fact, existing by the different normal level at which they begin their computation compared with ours. During the prewar period of 1911, 1912, and 1913 in our country business was hardly on a normal basis. The agitation coming from the campaign of 1912 was followed by a tariff revision in which schedules remained in the process of formation for many months—during the whole of the summer until September, 1913. During that agitation business fell off, and the fiscal year closing July 1, 1913, showed by the reflex action of the anticipated changes some lower levels of business for the last prewar year of 1913. Consequently when we begin to figure our war profits we figure from a lower average normal level of business in this country. This, of course, left a larger volume between that level and the 1917 level than otherwise.

In England, on the other hand, during the like years of 1911, 1912, and 1913, business was at a considerably higher normal level. Her business was prosperous. She, therefore, figures her profits from a higher level, leaving as a margin between the normal level and what are considered excess profits a much smaller volume in the aggregate and takes 80 per cent of this smaller volume between her higher normal level of business and the excess profits level. If she began at our level of war profits, as indicated here by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and by others in reply to the 80 per cent argument—if she began at our low level and raised a like sum of money on the resulting difference by the tax levies of her Parliament, it would, in fact, figure out on the volume of business and the money raised an average of about 46½ per cent of war profits. So I think we were justified in adhering finally to the recommendations made by the committee and to the amendment which the committee offered here making a half billion dollar increase in the aggregate.

I am fully satisfied, too, by comparing present financial conditions with other periods when we were raising large sums of money, that we are within the safe limit, even with the $11,000,000,000 bond issue bill coming from the other House, which will be acted on by the Senate in due time. We went through a period of great stress and strain at one time, Mr. President. In 1860 the entire wealth of the United States, according to the returns of the Census Bureau, was an aggregate of $16,159,616,000. In 1861, without time in the ordinary industrial life of the country for this aggregate to be very materially changed, a marked event in the history of our country occurred. Eleven States interpreted the Constitution under which we were living in a different way from the other States; they interpreted the ratification of that document and their powers under it as justifying an attempted withdrawal from the Union. That resulted in the passage by the legislatures of the States concerned of what are commonly known as the ordinances of secession. There were 11 rebellious States so attempting such withdrawal. By segregating the total wealth given in the census returns of the 11 States that engaged in rebellion we can readily ascertain the total wealth of the 22 loyal States. The 11 rebellious States returned a total wealth of $5,202,166,107 in the census of 1860. So the 22 Union States had of the total national wealth $10,957,449,961. In 1870 our total wealth had increased, in round numbers, to more than $30,000,000,000.

The public debt of all kinds, both interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing issues, passing either as current legal tender or the 7.30 Treasury notes issued reached its highest figure in 1865, the closing year of the war.

The public debt of the United States at that time, interest bearing and otherwise, reached the sum of $2,674,815,000. It is profitable in a few minutes this morning before we close the general discussion on the pending bill to note the percentages and compare them with the present resources and taxing power of the country. The public debt in 1865 was 16.55 per cent of the total wealth of the United States in 1860; it was 24½ per cent of the total wealth of the 22 Union States. If the wealth of the United States in 1870 be taken as a basis of calculation, the public debt in 1865 was 8.89 per cent, or nearly 9 per cent, of the total national wealth of the country. Of the 31,000,000 population, the 11 rebellious States took out with them 9,103,000, leaving something over 22,000,000 in the 22 States that remained loyal at that time. Population and taxable wealth are the fighting strength of nations.

The estimated total wealth in 1917 varies according to the liberality of the person making the calculation. The last definite figures compiled by the Census Bureau placed our wealth at $187,000,000,000. It rose under percentages conservatively calculated to an actual value of $200,000,000,000 before the beginning of the war in Europe in 1914. It is estimated by some statisticians, and by some Members of this body as well, whose opinions are entitled to credence, that the present total private wealth of the country aggregates $250,000,000,000. If this be taken as the basis, we can calculate the potential credit of the United States at the present time and we can name it in actual figures for business and tax-levying purposes.

On this basis, taking the public debt in 1865 and comparing it with the total wealth of 1860, as the percentages named, the potential present credit of the United States is over $40,000,000,000 of bond issues or other form of national credit. If we base the calculation on the 22 loyal States of the Union and what they possessed of the wealth of the Nation at that time, leaving out the 11 States that seceded, the potential credit of the United States is more than $60,000,000,000.

If we issue to-morrow through the Treasury Department $60,000,000,000 of bonds, based on $250,000,000,000, approximately of national wealth, our indebtedness would be no more than the indebtedness faced in 1865 by the 22 Union States in the event the war had failed and they had been called upon to pay the whole $2,674,000,000. On the basis of the public debt in 1865, compared to the Nation's wealth in 1870, the potential credit of the United States would be at this time more than $22,000,000,000. So even on the basis of the last calculation mentioned the bond bill that comes to us from the House, carrying upward of $11,000,000,000, involves no greater obligation than one-half what our ancestors and their sons who are still living faced in the Civil War upon the valuation placed on the total wealth of the country in 1870 under the public debt of 1865.

So there is no reason for alarm, Mr. President.

I have read articles in some financial journals and have had communications from certain investment companies and bond houses of Chicago expressing the fear that the credit of the country would be imperiled, not only by high taxes but by the excessive bond issues and the very great expenditures that are consequent upon the war. I offer these figures which I have drawn from the census returns and from the Treasury Department in order that they may have some reassurance and to give an adequate reply to that correspondence.

It is not well, Mr. President, to take all that it is possible to exact in taxes in one levy. Other emergencies will come. If there be any margin left in incomes or in excess profits or in war profits that can be drawn on, let us leave them. This war is not ended, and unhappily we have no assurance of when it will end.

We declared war for specific reasons. We have certain grievances, not of our seeking, but growing out of the conduct of the German Government. We declared that its decree creating danger zones in the high seas was unjustifiable, and that both belligerents and neutrals were interested in seeing that no such power was exercised by any Government. We declared that submarine warfare was piracy, and ought to be declared such by all civilized nations. We favor, indirectly at least, a limitation of armaments as a basis for permanent peace; we favor certain other lesser principles regulating the conduct of nations. For those principles, declared in public documents and messages of the President, we went to war. I am willing, so far as I have a vote on revenue measures or upon any matter looking to the prosecution of the war, to continue the war until those purposes shall have been accomplished. I believe in waging this war with our resources wherever necessary. If we can meet and disable our enemy on foreign soil, let us vote men and money to do so. It is better to fight the enemy in Europe than in the United States. If we can increase the fighting strength of the allies by loans, and so weaken or break the German power, it is wise for us to do so. We are at war, and if our enemy can be destroyed before reaching our shores our people will be spared the horrors which have been inflicted upon the allies in Europe.

I do not appreciate the strategy that would leave an enemy alone until he has devastated our own soil and killed our own people at home. If we are spared the unspeakable barbarities of German "kultur" here, it will be because our enemy is defeated in Europe before reaching our homes.

I have on two occasions here recorded my votes against the administration, and I am ready to defend those votes before the American people. I voted against the food-control bill and the draft act, and I have no apology to make for those votes.

The price of bread has not decreased in one market or to a single family in the United States. In the press reports of last night and this morning the food controller is reported as having stated that the price of meat can not be decreased. He has learned what every western stock raiser has known all along, namely, that the supply of beef cattle is short; they have been slaughtered for three years to feed the armies of Europe. The dairy supplies are short; the flocks and herds of the great livestock regions of our country have been depleted to feed the soldiers of the Old World. There is the lowest supply of the northern steer, producing meat fit for the export trade, to-day per capita of the population of our country of any time in the history of the United States.

Pork has gone to $20. Beef has risen to more than $18 on the hoof. Sheep have gone up accordingly. Every animal producing meat to feed mankind has reached unprecedented figures. Eggs are 60 cents a dozen in Washington, and still the Government lives and the food controller is in the full operation of his appointed powers. Every broken egg means a nickle. I looked at my bill this morning from the grocery, and eggs are 60 cents a dozen. Where is Hoover? Let him get after the recalcitrant hens of the country.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. REED] has specialized on this branch of legislation, and I will leave that field to him and his unrivaled powers to which I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure the Senator does not wish to do Mr. Hoover an injustice. The Senator, of course, knows that Mr. Hoover has been very active and that he has reduced the price of wheat to the farmer 3½ per cent since this act was passed, or about that amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not figured it up. I am very glad to have that information.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator that so far as I know I do not think the prices have been reduced to the consumer, but we do know that the price has been reduced to the producer.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand the Senator from North Dakota, this reduction has been made by reason of the fixing of the price that was announced a few days ago. Is that correct?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I have the word of Mr. Hoover himself that he had nothing to do with fixing that price. It was fixed by a committee called here by the President of the United States. The price was fixed by the President and under his direction.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will yield further, I will say to the Senator from Washington that he is too good a lawyer and too good a legislator to take any such excuse as that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, Mr. President, I want the responsibility fixed right where it belongs.

Mr. GRONNA. The responsibility is on Mr. Hoover, because Mr. Hoover is the food director.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The responsibility is on the President of the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. Just because Mr. Hoover saw fit to appoint a committee, that does not relieve Mr. Hoover from the responsibility.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. President, I do not care to pursue that inquiry, but in earlier days when I used to work out in the middle of a section of land on the prairie, when the hired man did something we always held his employer responsible.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a suggestion at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not see how it is possible for Mr. Hoover or the President to escape responsibility for the prices that prevail with regard to any product or to any supply for the household as to which the bill as passed by Congress gives Mr. Hoover, or the President through him, or any administrative body that he selects, the power to fix the price; and, Mr. President, there can be no question but that as to grain that power is vested in Mr. Hoover through the President, or in the President through Mr. Hoover. But as to what the consumer must pay for what he buys from the retail dealer, the Senator mentioned some of his own bills which he had been looking over this morning.

As I remember the terms of the act which Congress passed, no power whatever is given to the President or to Mr. Hoover to regulate the prices of retail dealers. For some reason or other, Congress withheld that power; and if I am right in my recollection of the terms of the bill, if any responsibility rests anywhere for the consumer paying higher prices for what he buys from the grocer and from the butcher and from every retail dealer, the responsibility rests upon Congress, and not upon the President and Mr. Hoover.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. Under the license clause of that bill the President can reach everybody, every dealer in the country; at least, it seems so to me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very certain that the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken, and I am willing to put my analysis of that bill and the deductions which I draw from it and which I briefly stated here against that of the Senator from Massachusetts. I invite the Senators, if they have any doubt about the matter, to look up that question pretty thoroughly before they discuss this bill upon the assumption that the President and Mr. Hoover could be held responsible for the prices paid by consumers to retail dealers.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin is absolutely correct; and I think it will be found that the bill especially provides that it shall apply only to the manufacturers and the wholesalers, and not to retailers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President—

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Illinois now yield, if to any one?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to say, in connection with what my colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] has stated, that the bill does provide that they can regulate retail dealers doing a business above $100,000. That is very specifically stated; but neither the President nor Mr. Hoover can regulate the business of any retailer doing a business of less than $100,000 per year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would leave out substantially all the retailer dealers of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, Congress classified the middlemen, exterminated some, and let the others alone. The retail dealer was among the favored class of middlemen who were not disturbed. I am not complaining about that. I am going upon the assumption that whenever the retail middlemen can buy at lower prices, they will make lower prices to the consumer. I will not presume that they will be unduly avaricious, and attempt to collect more than would be fairly remunerative to the business. So I shall assume the retail merchant charges present prices because his buying prices are still high.

The other measure which I opposed was the conscription act. I voted for the volunteer-enlistment plan as an amendment to the Army act. I am not dogmatic about that. I do not say that those who were of a different opinion were wholly in error. I only voted my own view of it. After the volunteer amendment was defeated I supported the conscription bill. It is sufficient to say that those entertaining views contrary to mine on the volunteer plan prevailed in Congress, and the present act for the Military Establishment of the country is on a conscription basis.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the conscription act must be the act under which this war is fought to a conclusion. If there were a roll call within the next five minutes on the repeal of the conscription act, I would vote against that repeal. We have embarked on this war on the basis of that law. We are now engaged in raising armies for the public defense under that act. We can not amend it safely at the present time; but this war must be carried to a conclusion under the existing law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to say that what I had in my mind was the original and more sweeping provision. Under the law as it stands any retailer doing a business of less in gross sales than $100,000 per annum is entirely exempted from license. The Senator from Wisconsin was right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care further to discuss that.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator for allowing me to make that statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply alluded to it in passing as one of the two acts that I had not supported that were favored by the administration. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is always candid in his discussions; he seeks truth and not mere forensic advantage.

I shall vote for the revenue act, Mr. President, in whatever form it finally comes to a roll call, whether it embodies a single amendment which I favored, and regarded as necessary to perfect the bill, or not. We must have the revenue. The public obligations must be met. It will not be long until interest will be due on the new obligations. That interest must be paid. Vast expenditures in the Navy and in the Army Departments of the Government must be met. More will be made in the future. This money, therefore, is indispensable to the public defense; and there is no alternative except to support these measures, however much we may differ as to the details.

To those who were dissatisfied because there were not greater levies made, I have only this suggestion to make: Future levies will be necessary, as fresh conscriptions of men will be necessary. Both men and money will be required in larger amounts before this unhappy war in which the world is involved shall have arrived at an end.

We declared war, as I have stated, for certain purposes, and we are levying taxes in support of that war. We have embarked upon a war the goal of which no living man can tell. If it shall end a twelfth month from now, what will the settled issues be? Can any Senator reply? Can the Chief Magistrate of the country tell us? Evidently it is beyond human foresight. If it scourge the earth for years how will it end? We can hope but we do not know. We only know this, that in the press reports of yesterday morning Premier Ribot, of the French Republic, announced that the French Nation would never cease war until Alsace and Lorraine were restored to the French dominion. Not long ago the Italian responsible minister, speaking for that country, declared that the Adriatic Sea Provinces must be retaken, and the crime of 1866 and other days must be avenged by the return of the Italian territory on the Austrian shore of the Adriatic Sea. Not many weeks after the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour was here in this Chamber he returned to England. He delivered a significant address. In substance, it was that the United Kingdom would not conclude peace until Alsace and Lorraine were restored to France. The next day criticism came from the Italian Government. It inquired why Mr. Balfour had not alluded to the Italian Provinces that that Nation desired.

Mr. Balfour in reply said he was only referring to a specific instance. When he referred to Italy as one of their allies he was in full accord with the purposes of Italy in claiming the territory wrested from them by the fortunes of war a half century ago.

The President very properly, in a message here some months ago, alluded to the independence of Poland. England stated that she believed in the restoration of the sovereignty and protecting the sovereignty of the smaller nations of the world.

He would do that to enable them to work out their own course of development and protect them from the military aggressions and conquests of their stronger neighbors.

Constantinople has been a problem for a thousand years. Since Constantine surrendered in 1453 and the Turk took possession it has been an acute problem in all the civilized world.

Mr. President, in 1853 if Great Britain had entertained the same views of the unspeakable Turk, Abdul Hamid the Damned, as the public press called him for some years, never would have left the bloody trail across Armenia that marked the declining years of the Turkish Empire that he administered. In the Crimean War, England, France, and Sardinia backed the Turk against the aggressions of Russia, which sought to save the members of her own race, the Slavic blood, the Greek Catholics, and the Armenians, that were then in the grasp of the Ottoman Empire. The Crimean War, with the United Kingdom of Great Britain against Russia, by her efforts left the Turk in Europe and Asia in all the territory that he holds at the present time.

In 1772, Mr. President, Frederick the Great would have been utterly crushed if England had not sent her legions into the field to fight the wars that preserved Frederick the Great from extermination. Frederick the Great was the ancestor of the present Kaiser, who thinks he looks like him, acts like him, and is trying to leave behind him a history that will enable him to be referred to as Wilhelm the Great.

The problems of the East Mediterranean are well known. England has at Gibraltar the strongest fortified post in the world, provisioned to stand an indefinite siege, with chambers that go down into the solid rock so far that no guns will ever be founded whose shells can reach the innermost bowels of the fortifications of Gibraltar. It is the entrance of the Mediterranean. It is the way through the Suez Canal to the Orient. They propose to hold it. England holds Malta in the Mediterranean Sea, and going through the Mediterranean by the Suez Canal into the Red Sea she gains an entrance into the Pacific Ocean and her far eastern possessions. That is the problem.

Every once in a while I used to pick up a copy of a Socialist paper that was suppressed not long ago, and I would read in the editorial, Why is Europe at War? This is one of the reasons. Pass through the Suez Canal, pass Singapore, a British post, and then all the British East Indies are reached. It is England's and the allies' commercial problem, the expansion of the territory of some and England's vast shipping, whose colors went around the world, that were involved in this controversy. It is not the only question, but it is a most material part of the world war.

In the Balkan country, as everyone knows, there are numerous small States more or less dependent upon the good offices of their powerful neighbors. Germany began to drive a wedge down through the Balkan States to the Mediterranean. The present Kaiser had the dream of a railway from Berlin to Bagdad. He desired to reach the confines of ancient Persia, and was about to do so when this war came.

Russia, with her wheat fields around the Black Sea, has always wanted to get down through the Bosphorus from the Black Sea into the warm waters of the Mediterranean. She wanted Constantinople and the Balkan shores of the Mediterranean. This concerned England. So the Crimean War was fought, and Russia was defeated in her ambition.

Again, Mr. President, they now happen to agree, because Germany, having driven this wedge through on her way to Bagdad, has threatened the supremacy both of Russia and of England. So whatever it is now, it was a commercial controversy in the beginning.

Africa is a vast unexplored continent yet, the source of industrial supplies of raw material. Tropical woods and metals abound, and the rubber that has become indispensable to civilized man. It is a great source of material for many industries that are indispensable to the comforts of civilized man. It is still undeveloped. It is yet at the point of exploration. Every European nation has had colonies there—Leopold of Belgium, in the Congo country; Great Britain, beginning at Cape Town; Germany, on the east shore; France, on the east part of Africa along the north, through Tripoli, Tunis, and Morocco. Germany has not colonized; she has only occupied. Her population in her East African colonies can be numbered by the thousands on the finger of one hand. She holds them purely for commercial purposes.

What are they at war about? Indeed, Mr. President, because they have either peacefully to settle the commercial controversies and rivalries of recent years and the territorial disputes for a thousand years or they must go to war and decide by the god of battle who should possess the stronger hand and take the prize of the markets of the world and annex the territory of the other. Back of it all lies the military power of Germany and the autocracy of the crowned Prussian. With Germany it is a desire for world dominion linked to commercial enterprise.

The brutality of Germany in Belgium is without palliation or excuse. It is the result of the teaching of philosophers, of statesmen, and warriors of Germany for 40 years or more. The heartless teachings of Nietzsche has borne its bloody fruit by its university professors making it a part of the discipline that was ground into the German students in her universities. It was the beginning of the school of German thought, and from this head it percolated through until it reached the peasant in the field and the ditch digger in the streets of Berlin.

The President says he appeals from the Kaiser to the German people. So do we all. So do we fervently hope that the German people may at last awake from the domination of Prussian autocracy that has held them in leash for more than half a century. From the time that Bismarck, with his policy of blood and iron, welded the German Provinces into unity until the present it has been dominated by a military caste that was essentially despotic in its influence and brutal in its exercise of power.

We, therefore, having declared war, while we are not, so far as any action of Congress is involved, tied irrevocably to the allies, yet we are waging war in a common cause. Our motives, though, have not so far been analyzed. Have the American people any joint motive with the people of the allies at this time? I doubt it. So far as public opinion goes, so far as Congress has spoken upon the question, there is a joint motive only in part in the prosecution of the war for which we are appropriating this money. We went in for the purposes I have already stated. They were our declared grievances and they were just grievances; they ought to and must be corrected, and until they are corrected and the limitation of armaments becomes the basis of permanent peace, this Republic is justified in levying every dollar of taxes and of taking every man who is capable of bearing arms until it shall be the law that Germany can not by such ideals and military force dominate the civilized world.

That is the only common motive so far in the struggle. In that I apprehend there will be no difference of opinion among any of our people. No loyal citizen of the country can for a moment hesitate when this issue is before him.

What else is there? We cross the sea. We will have a million men across. We have already loaned them over $2,000,000,000, with a credit yet of the old loan of a billion dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury in the hearings before the House said that $4,000,000,000 more of loans would be required for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, provided their requirements were on the same basis of the preceding months which he has filled from time to time.

So we, with the allies of Europe, are at war not by any formal treaty or declaration, but acting in concert with them. The American people must decide. This Senate can not long delay settling the question whether if Germany concedes all the redress of grievances we demanded on entering the war we must or will still prosecute the war with the expenditure of these billions of dollars, with some millions of American lives.

I shall state the question as I understand it, because ultimately the American people must know it. They will never learn it from the New York City press. They will never get it from certain other papers who shout nothing but war. They will not glean it from the labored editorials of a single one of the New York City dailies. They know better, or fear the effect on the American people, if they carry these principles to their logical conclusion at this time.

It may not be wise for the administration to announce what our goal may be. I am willing to let it rest for the present with the constituted authorities on that subject. I state what the logic of events is, and I will state the probable destination toward which we are marching with all the swiftness that presages the colossal character of the war.

We now, with the allies of Europe, are jointly at war. The American people hardly realize they are engaged in a foreign war. If Germany shall suggest offers with guarantees that any civilized power like this Republic should be disposed to accept as a redress of grievances, what will we do? How will we vote in this Senate Chamber? Will we vote not to accept that redress of grievances and pledge of good conduct in those particulars in the future or will we be bound to continue a foreign war to annex the territory I have described and to exact indemnity from a conquered foe for the benefit of the allies? That is the real question here in the subconscious thought of every Senator.

In all the mutations of the revenue debate, in all the details of legislation since the 2d of April, especially the last three months, we have reached the point where there continually arises in our thought: If that issue shall be presented to us, will we vote to continue the American people in a foreign war to annex territory, to exact indemnity, to avenge the wrongs and feuds of the nations of Europe for a thousand years, levying taxes and shedding our blood that England may settle the problems of the east Mediterranean and her way to her British East India possessions; to give Italy her provinces; to return to France what Bismarck took from her in 1871; to partition Africa; drive the Turk from Europe, make him give pledges for his behavior in Asia; and to continue a war to give to the allies of Europe territory around the globe and indemnity? When it is done what will we have on the side of the ledger when we balance the account? Any place from twenty to forty billions of indebtedness, any sacrifice of life from half a million to two millions of headstones somewhere in the Old World.

No graver issue ever faced a great parliamentary body since a free people have instituted a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed. This momentous problem is at last for the American people to decide. Why is not the question placed before them now? They are entitled to time to deliberate, to discuss, to analyze, and to weigh. They have a right to know the causes and the reasons for the unparalleled sacrifice they will make. Are they to be kept uninformed until their elected public officers have irrevocably committed them to the performance of something of which they are ignorant and on which their votes have never been given? Shall we calculate on that ignorance and a clamorous public press to hurry them on to a course already decided on and not revealed until there is no alternative? Does this resemble republican government? Is this the way to make democracy safe for the world or even for America? Not one American voter in a hundred now knows the fateful course we are pursuing or the powerful currents beginning to draw us into the maelstrom of a world war we did not cause but in which we may be compelled to struggle for our national life. In this mighty drama of the human race staged on the entire habitable globe it is time the whole truth be communicated to our people. This they have not had sufficiently to enable them to decide justly to themselves and the world how far they will commit themselves to settle the controversies of Europe.

The issues may compel the American people to follow these questions to their conclusion. It may at last be the only way to redress the grievances for which we declared the war. The people who bear the burden must be informed and given an opportunity to express themselves on the whole issue.

Will we have any territory or any indemnity? Not a dollar, not a square foot, because both are contrary to our declared purposes and ideals.

If I ever thought the American people were not an idealistic people I would no longer think it, because we are now in a war that is purely idealistic. We are somewhat like the fictitious hero Don Quixote, who had the highest ideals in the world but often fought with those who had quite practical and worldly purposes of their own to serve.

We want no territory and no indemnity. We will take none. It is against our policy. I never would vote to go to war for a single acre of land to be annexed to this country. We have now more than we know what to do with and more than we can successfully govern. I do not wish indemnities for ourselves. I would not fight a moment for either. I would rather levy taxes and vote for bond issues than to vote for indemnity for our country to be taken from Germany, even after she is beaten to her knees.

What will we do? We must ultimately vote here one way or the other. Let it be known to-day throughout the country, let it be known to the American people, that we are embarked upon a course that, unless peace shall come speedily, ultimately will lead us to a foreign war of territorial conquest and indemnities. It will entangle us with alliances against which the Father of our Country warned us in his Farewell Address. It is a formal reading of it every February 22, it is true, but nevertheless it seems to have a phrase of apparently prophetic insight describing the future destiny and difficulties of the country that he founded.

With these matters in the future, Mr. President, it is well for us to keep some taxing resources for other levies, because if we must continue to the end of a possible war of conquest leading us around the world, we will need more than $2,500,000,000 of additional tax levies annually and more than $11,000,000,000 of bonds. We will need $5,000,000,000 of annual levies and $40,000,000,000 of bonds before this world-wide war is ended, before the allies annex desired territory, the Kaiser in exile, abdicated, or deposed, and the German people will have framed under the direction of a beneficent government here a government of their own according to our ideals and not theirs, or I fear before the German people will have created one satisfactory to us.

Before that is done we will have sent the allies more money and we will have offered upon the shrine of our idealism millions of lives of our citizens.

The vote in the German Reichstag, the expressions from the Austrian authorities, the papal peace note, all indicate that permanent peace may not be an idle wish with safety and honor to the belligerents. Shall we close all avenues that seem worth while?

So I am disposed to think in just this brief outline sketch of where we are traveling, of the difficulties we are likely to encounter, and of the insuperable burden of traveling to the goal where the European nations are headed for victory or defeat. I am disposed to think we had better be prudent and keep our tax levies within reasonable limits and husband our resources for future contingencies.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] gave a very striking illustration of a man of moderate income nowadays, how much he would pay in taxes; and when the critics tell me that the wealth of the country has not been conscripted, my reply will be that the wealth of the country has been conscripted to as great an extent as its flesh and blood. In the Merchant of Venice, Shylock said:

You take my house when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life
When you do take the means whereby I live.

Primarily government is for the protection of the rights of persons, but secondarily it is the protection of property. Property makes life tolerable, cares for dependents, and exercises the greater part of our productive years. So we ought to have some care for property.

I think the Senate Committee on Finance, all things considered, even in their first report made a very fair levy upon property. It did not satisfy me entirely, and I would have voted for an increase, as I told some of the gentlemen who consulted me about how I felt on the subject. But the increase came. On the income tax as suggested I would have voted for a little greater increase if I had had my way about it. But we have to finish all these things some time, and if we travel through to the end in this war we will have abundant opportunity to conscript the incomes of all citizens of the United States long before it is ended.

We went through the Civil War. Those who were then in business know something of what followed. Men of my generation were in the cradle when the war broke out. I can just remember the last drumbeats that rolled away when the soldiers came back in 1865. Those who lived through that time remember the inflation in prices. They remember the condition of the currency, the Treasury notes, the greenbacks, all the vast expansion of credit that came as a necessary means of waging the war. I can not go into details; I do not wish to take the time. I only remind Senators of the fact.

The war closed in 1865. It took eight years to work out its legitimate results. When the war closed we were upon a high level of prices. Talk to the old bankers who went through that period; read the record of that time, we of a younger generation. Speculation of every kind was rife; legitimate business was good; values of land shot upward; farm produce was salable at high figures all the time. We kept on that level until a downward tendency manifested itself in 1873. The first difficulty arose when the speculator who was endeavoring to become a millionaire on borrowed money felt the inevitable pinch which comes from the decrease in values. He applied for a renewal of his loans; his collateral had shrunk; his assets that were not up as collateral began to depreciate a few per cent. It was not a question of a depreciation 50 per cent in 1871, but it was a question of the depreciation of any per cent; it was the direction in which business affairs were drifting rather than the distance they had then drifted.

The wise man, however, of that time who saw the shadows the coming events cast before them began to husband his resources. The banker refused to renew the speculators' loans. They realized on his collateral, and every bond or share of stock of collateral placed on the market only accelerated the downward movement of prices. Depositors began to hoard their money. In the report made by the National Monetary Commission an instance is given in New York City of certain retail merchants who ceased to deposit their cash and put it in a safety deposit box or sold the cash for a high premium to the brokers who had to have it. That again accelerated the downward tendency; the scarcity of the circulating medium became apparent; prices fell rapidly, and by 1873 there was a panic. Speculation was at an end; legitimate business suffered with the rest; inflated prices had the water squeezed out of them; they began to settle down to a hardpan and actual value basis. The panic of 1873 became an accomplished fact. Will we hedge against such a panic or shall we be deaf to the voice of experience and repeat sometime, when this war ends, the melancholy experience between 1865 and 1873?

All of this $250,000,000,000 of taxable resources is private wealth. Every time a man becomes bankrupt the Government has lost a taxable resource. It is like the bad health of a citizen. It is a resource gone; it is one less available musket in time of war. Every time we lose a business the country has lost something and the Government has lost a taxable resource. So we do not wish to repeat that experience if there is any way to avoid it.

Some of that generation are still living and some are still doing business. Some of them are chairmen of the boards of directors in Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and other cities. I have several neighbors who were in business in 1873 in Chicago and elsewhere. They tell me of the era of high prices and warn me against a repetition of the melancholy experience of 1873. Prices now have gone to an uncomfortable level, but that is the history of all wars. It is the same way in England.

That reminds me of what I read in a London newspaper night before last. They are complaining now in the food bureau that Great Britain, when prices are high and she has laid in a supply of grain at a low level, does not sell it at the high level in order for the margin of profit to balance up what she is going to lose when she buys high and has to sell low. That is just what the naughty middleman has always been doing from the time that Joseph received his brethren in Egypt, and it was only on account of its being in the family that he did not exact usury; but when any of the barbarians from distant Asia came in for a handout they paid 600 per cent cash on the market. They want England to do the same thing.

We have engaged in a similar little enterprise of our own, Mr. President, and unless the Government makes profits when the market falls and we are long we shall lose. Who will lose? Oh, the Treasury. Well, now, do not delude yourselves with the notion that that is something that like the manna to the children of Israel merely falls from the heavens at appropriate intervals. It does not fall from that place, but it is extracted from the taxpayer's pocket; and that includes us as well as others of our citizens. Our salaries may be reduced, for next January a paternal Government will retain from our pay checks 4 per cent or whatever the increase may be that we vote. So we are ourselves concerned in all these things, and we want to keep our taxable resources just as high as we can.

When we are through with this, what will we have in the country? We shall have munition plants. Yes; and everybody says, "They made war profits; do not have any kindly solicitude about them." Let that be granted. There is not an enterprise in this country that to-day is not affected by the war and is not a war enterprise. The bushel of navy beans raised in southern Illinois and the bushel of northern spring wheat which is raised in North Dakota are all war supplies. A mule colt that first saw daylight last spring in the Ozark Mountains in Missouri is a war munition of the Government, because after a while he will be a Government mule and he will be across on the frontiers of France striking terror into the hearts of the Kaiser's subjects. I am quite sure we will never be conquered as long as the mule holds out, and while he is the emblem of the Democratic Party, I never looked on that as a matter of reflection at all, because I think he is the wisest, toughest beast that mankind knows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). May the Chair ask the Senator which he thinks most typifies the mule, his brain or his kicking capacity?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, either.

Mr. NEW. He is formidable at either end.

Mr. SHERMAN. Enterprises of all kinds will be on a war basis; profits will be on a war basis; wages will be on a war basis; the price of raw material, whatever it may be, will be on a war basis. How is business conducted nowadays? Not by guess. If it is conducted by guess it is not conducted long, because people now begin to figure very accurately and the question of fractions of per cents spells the story of profit and loss on the ledger.

What is raw material? It is the old story: One man's raw material is some one's else finished product. So iron ore is raw material to the man who is smelting pig iron, but to the man who owns the iron ore it is his finished product when it is put into the barge in northern Michigan. The United States Steel Co.

has its own mines, its own transportation lines, its own barges, and it brings down to the foot of navigation in Lake Michigan all its iron ore used in its plants at Gary and in all the surrounding country, and they manufacture all the pig iron they want out of the iron ore which they own.

To illustrate: In recent years in the open-hearth processes of steel making several compounds have been used. One is fluorspar, which comes from certain parts of the United States; another is manganese ore that must be prepared in a given form. The commercial form, after the ore has been treated, is known as ferromanganese. About two and a quarter tons of ore added to two and a quarter tons of coke produce one ton of ferromanganese. About 30,000 tons of this is used in steel making in the United States every 12 months. It takes about 18 pounds of the ferromanganese to make 1 ton of steel. So, comparatively, for the finished product, it takes a small quantity.

Twenty-five per cent of the total quantity of manganese ore used in the United States is found in our own country. The rest of it came formerly in peace times from Europe and some from Brazil. Now we can get not a pound of it in our market from Europe. England controls some mines outside of her own borders, but she needs them for her own use. Germany controls some mines, but she has no ocean transportation; there is an actual blockade of her merchant shipping. In Brazil there is a very large supply of manganese ore owned by certain Portuguese subjects who live in that country and operate the mines. Before the war broke out their total output and sales in a year amounted to 150,000 tons; their sales in 1916 were 650,000 tons, because they are furnishing the market in all North America and elsewhere.

In our own country the main source of supply is the manganese mines of Brazil owned by these gentlemen. In peace times it cost $10 to have a ton of the ore put into the harbor of New York; it now costs $60 to put the same ton in the same place. The company in Brazil deal with you, not on your terms but on their terms. If you want to buy manganese ore from them, you will make a contract for at least a year and sometimes 18 months in advance. When you make the contract it is through their agent in New York that the final details are arranged, and you must arrange at the same time for an irrevocable credit covering the whole amount of the contract for the period named, whatever it is—12 or 18 months. As I have said, it now costs not $10 but $60 a ton.

Well, what will the Government do about it? There is the United States Steel Co. It is always held up as the bogey of corporate control. Very well, let it be granted; we will not argue their case; we will not present the facts that affect them, because they are not materially affected; they have their own mines; they manufacture their own ferromanganese for every hearth they control or own. They sell none of the ferromanganese on the market; they make it for themselves. All of the plants in North Chicago and elsewhere in Illinois, the Harvey Steel Co., the Joliet Mills and all, draw their supplies from the same source; they are all a part of the one great company; they are not affected; prices may go up or down, but they still have the ore in the mine, and they have still the same processes and plants for manufacturing the ferromanganese, however low the price may fall. They do not sell it on the market; they use it themselves. It is merely an item in the manufacture of their multifarious products. But they are not the only concerns that use this product; there are some smaller companies and there are some companies that are beginning to manufacture from the ore and to sell it on the market. It is to these latter that I more particularly direct my remarks. What I have just said has been by way of preliminary to explain the situation that affects the smaller company.

A smaller company with $1,000,000 capital or $5,000,000 capital beginning the manufacture of ferromanganese must have contracts—and such contracts actually exist now for ore—covering 18 months. They are bound, and they put up collateral covering the credit for that period, to pay at the rate of $60 per ton delivered at New York City Harbor. What is the object of this? The Government has asked for ferromanganese; it is an essential of war; no concern manufacturing modern steel, a commodity that affects the life and safety of this Republic and gives the fighting man of American blood a fair chance against the disciplined troops of Germany, should neglect the opportunity to make the best steel known to the craft.

So ferromanganese is an essential element in the manufacture of steel. Covered by contracts for at least 12 months from the 1st day of September, say, 1917, at $60 a ton, selling on the market, what does the average company or business man face? He faces the ordinary hazards of business, which are sufficiently great, but he sells nothing in his business but ferromanganese.

He has no related products. That is his business. He is furnishing it to the steel companies so that they can manufacture the things that are required for the successful prosecution of the war. Very well; he has covered it by credit. He takes the ordinary risks I have referred to, and in addition two other risks, Mr. President. The one is price fixing by the Government; the other is the end of the war by a treaty of peace made at an unknown time. Either event powerfully affects his ability to do business. Under present conditions, without prudent requirements to safeguard the operations, both of them happening together, or even one, may mean bankruptcy for the enterprise. There is no escape from it.

What has been done heretofore? I call attention to this with no particular satisfaction, because I do not follow suit just because England does a given thing; but the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] offered some very instructive figures here a few days ago on the money that England had raised. I only give them from memory now. He said that in the three-year war period she has levied about $25,000,000,000 in gold of our money, of which $3,000,000,000 could be charged, in round numbers—$2,970,000,000, but I am only using the round figures—to the ordinary civil expenses that would be incurred if no war were on; $6,000,000,000, in round numbers, has been loaned to foreign Governments, her allies in this war, making $9,000,000,000 altogether; making a total for the three years of money expended, in round figures, of $16,000,000,000.

Now, as against that, for the three years the tax levies raised by England were $6,000,000,000, so that in round figures, taking out the ordinary civil expenses and interest on the public debt, it left not much more than $2,000,000,000 of actual war levies that were made in the three years by her revenue bill, originating in the House of Commons, as ours originate over in the other House.

Here are some of the laws under which the cases I have described are provided for; and before I leave that branch of the matter let me say that not only in such industries as that of manufacturing ferromanganese, but in others, the same thing holds true. Back in the western country in many places are concerns manufacturing vast quantities of barbed wire. Those requirements are not for agricultural purposes. They are for war purposes. The concerns must buy their steel billets in advance in the same way. Barbed wire is no longer made out of iron. It is a steel wire. They must buy for at least 12 months in advance. The manager of one of the largest concerns, one of my constituents, faces the following condition:

When he approached the steel company to buy steel billets for a year or for a given time, they told him he would have to make a contract and put up collateral for a 12-months' supply. "How much do you want?" He said: "Well, I do not know whether I can comply with it or not." The reply was: "It is not a question with us whether we sell to you or not. Do you want the steel, or do you not want it? If you do not want it, we can sell it at any time. We will fill your order because you are an old customer, and we would rather hold you than lose you."

They entered into a contract for a year. Pig iron is the basis. The current price of pig iron in the first year of the war, 1914-15, was $16.50. Pig iron in 1917 averaged nearly $52, over 300 per cent of an increase. The manager of this company was obliged to enter into a contract for steel billets for 12 months in advance at the increased price.

Not long ago the Chief Executive said that he intended to take over the United States Steel Corporation, refused to confer with its managers who came here, the responsible heads, and intimated that this was to be the first great example of assuming control of a great enterprise by the Government.

It has not been done up to this time. I assume satisfactory prices were made, or relations were entered into that prevented it; but if it had been done, what effect would that have had on the contract made by the wire company?

It is the same experience that the agricultural-implement men have had out in the Mississippi Valley. As I have stated two or three times on the floor of the Senate, they can get 75 per cent of their requirements to manufacture agricultural implements for next year; and they are now manufacturing corn planters to be used next March and April. Next month—October—they will begin to manufacture the binders to take the wheat fields of North America under their care.

The wire manufacturer, in the event the Government takes over the United States Steel Corporation, or fixes prices, will meet this danger: Suppose the Government fixes prices on steel billets. What will happen? The product, a part of which is war orders and part not, will be sold at the contract price of steel for the 12 months. If the Government fixes a lower price it spells loss on the contract through no fault of the company, through no misadventure or lack of prudence of the manager, but one of the inevitable incidents of governmental operation in war times.

Suppose the war ends. Pig iron and steel billets will go back to their old prices in the prewar period. What does that do for a legitimate enterprise of this kind? It bankrupts it. The controlling man in this company began more than 30 years ago, as a boy on a farm in central Illinois, making a barbed wire that had merit in it, and it developed into the present company; and to-day he is doing business with this constant peril in front of him, based upon governmental price fixing and upon the conclusion of peace.

These taxes levied here, 52.9 per cent of excess profits tax, added to the income tax after the money is distributed, to the shareholders, mean to him all the taxes he can stand, even if his business were not attended by these inevitable risks.

Sulphuric acid is a necessary ingredient in making explosives in Gary or any of the other large plants. We have not enough sulphur pyrites in this country to make the sulphuric acid we actually need. We import that product from Spain. To get it we face the same condition that we do in manganese ore in Brazil. Not a man can get supplies without contracting a year or more in advance and putting up good collateral or establishing credit to pay for the whole period covered, and paying prices that run from 200 to 500 per cent in advance of the normal prices during the prewar period.

There is another product used in blowing up us Christians when we do not agree with each other—toluol. It is a sort of juice of a tropical tree that oozes out something like turpentine. It is a peculiarity of the white man, and especially the disciple of the meek and lowly Nazarene, that he hunts all over the earth to get something that will blow souls to eternity in the most accomplished and destructive way. Nothing more indicates the need of humanity for a union of nations to enforce peace than this melancholy truth.

What does England do under those conditions that face the manufacturers of her necessary supplies? The commissioner of inland revenue corresponds to something like certain powers delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury, to hear and determine, upon certain facts presented to him, whether a given levy shall be made or exempted. I read from the excess profits tax of Great Britain, a document of the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, prepared by the legislative reference division of the Library of Congress, on page 4, out of section 40, paragraph (3):

Where it appears to the commissioners of inland revenue, on the application of a taxpayer in any particular case, that any provisions of the fourth schedule to this act—

The fourth schedule, referred to, is where the taxpayer makes his return—should be modified in his case, owing to a change in the constitution of a partnership or to the postponement or suspension, as a consequence of the present war, of renewals or repairs, or to exceptional depreciation or obsolescence of assets employed in the trade or business due to the present war, or to the necessity in connection with the present war of providing plant which will not be wanted for the purposes of the trade or business after the termination of the war, or to any other special circumstances specified in regulations made by the treasury, those commissioners shall have power to allow such modifications of any of the provisions of that schedule as they think necessary in order to meet the particular case.

That was intended to cover, Mr. President, just such conditions as I have described. It was intended to preserve the subjects of King George from bankruptcy when the war closes—to make prudent provision for that future event—so that the business might be conducted without incurring the risk that would end in insolvency.

In the passage of some of our measures here we have recognized practically the same thing, Mr. President, because in the act of September 8, 1916, occurs the following paragraph, found on pages 28 and 29 of that act, in pamphlet form. On page 28 it refers to the munition manufacturer's tax; and on page 29, in paragraph (f), is the following provision:

A reasonable allowance, according to the conditions peculiar to each concern, for amortization of the values of buildings and machinery, account being taken of the exceptional depreciation of special plants.

This refers more particularly to the tangible property, real estate, and equipment used in the manufacture; but equal risk attaches in the purchase of material for the long-time periods named that I have described; and the risk is even greater, because under the prices named very large liabilities are incurred. So it seems to me that there are two provisions of law, one in our own country and one in England, that recognize the justice of making some provision to protect the owners of the enterprise. It is obvious that profits made on deliveries this month may be absorbed by losses in next month's delivery. It is equally apparent that profits made at the end of a given business year may be entirely destroyed by losses the next business year or a part of that year in the execution of contracts for which the business is bound in the purchase of material at the prices I have suggested.

New plants to supply the essentials of the war can be undertaken only subject to the foregoing risks. Extensions of old plants to enable the fulfillment of Government contracts are subject to the same risks. The owners are facing the possible taking over by the Government if they can not undertake the performance in due season and the delivery of supplies to the Government. War taxes are levied upon war profits. The Government thereby becomes a partner. In private partnerships all partners are equally bound to stand losses. In this instance, however, of Government partnership, it participates only in profits; it bears no losses. All losses are borne by the private enterprise. In addition, if business disorder comes, the private owner goes to his ruin alone. Ought not the Government partner, in fairness, to enable the private partner to safeguard himself against bankruptcy incident to the extraordinary risks attending war contracts?

Until all existing future contracts based on war prices have been executed, the interim gains as I have described them ought not to be taken as war gains and taxable. They ought not merely because they are profits to be taxable, but ought to be allowed to be set aside until the contract has been executed and liquidated and the profits remain after all the liabilities have been discharged. All these profits on paper may be stricken out by fluctuations to a lower level over which the business man has no control. The man who embarks in business may become a victim of the superior forces of organized government or the drift of events which even government can not control and which no human vigilance can foresee.

I do not like to take so much time. I thought I would not occupy a moment in the discussion of this bill because I intended to vote for the revenue bill in whatever form it finally came to a roll call, whether I fully agreed with the details of it or not. But it seemed to me that this provision that I am mentioning ought in justice, as has been recognized in the act of September 8, 1916, be continued, not only as to the plant, the property, the real estate, and equipment, but continued as to profits made on the product delivered.

In accordance with that I have offered certain amendments. I offered them finally on the calendar day of August 30, 1917. The first amendment covers in substance all of them, only it amends different sections of the income tax in such a way as to make the act itself intelligible and properly to be applied.

Subdivision (a) of section 5 of the act of September 8, 1916, is hereby further amended by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

When I read one of these series of amendments it will explain all of them. The first applies to resident citizens and resident aliens of the United States. The second one applies to nonresident aliens, and the third applies to domestic and foreign corporations and amends sections 5, 6, and 12 of the act of September 8, 1916, the income-tax provision, so as to cover the contingencies I have described. These are deductions that are to be allowed in the income-tax returns, which in turn become the basis on which war excess profits are computed. It is in the following language:

Reasonable amounts set aside during the year out of income received in that year, as shrinkage funds, to meet losses that may result from the shrinkage in value of merchandise, materials, and supplies on hand, or purchased and not delivered: Provided—

I think it would not do to make that an absolute rule, because it might be abused. Dishonest men might take advantage of it and might escape taxation and impair the public revenue. It ought to be made only in case there is some supervising power that will see that no injustice results to the Public Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates are vigilant in the collection of the public revenue. It is a part of their duty. They not only collect it, but they supervise the expenditure of the vast funds passing into the Treasury. So this proviso is contained further:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon complaint, shall find in the particular case that such shrinkage funds are reasonably necessary, and shall ascertain the reasonableness of the amounts thereof, and the finding and ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury in any and all such cases shall be conclusive and final: Provided further—

And here it is, when the contracts have been executed, the account ended, the liabilities under which they have labored for the advance price of material have been met, and it is definitely known the contract is ended, and these actual profits as of the year shall then be taxable, and it is proper they should be. So the further proviso covers the loss of revenue unless it was specifically provided for in some cases—

Provided further, That any amount so set aside in such a shrinkage fund, or any part thereof, that shall not be used during the year next succeeding the year in which it shall have been set aside to meet such losses shall be included in the return of the taxpayer for such succeeding year and shall be taxed at the rate prescribed by law for the year in which it shall have been set aside.

So it pays finally a tax which would be paid if there was no such provision made. It is only a postponement of the time of payment until it is found whether the enterprise has any profits to tax or not and until the great liability under these excess profits has been met where there are excess profits. It must be remembered that they are excess profits of the kind I have described that are indispensable in the conduct of the business and that the enterprise must incur.

The tax shall be assessed upon the basis of the income without taking into account the shrinkage funds provided for in this paragraph, but the taxpayer claiming the benefit of this paragraph may, at the time of making the return, file a claim for abatement of the amount by which the tax so assessed exceeds the tax computed upon the basis of the income when such shrinkage funds are taken into account. In such event collection of the part of the tax covered by such claim for abatement shall not be made until the claim is decided, but if in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the interests of the United States would be jeopardized thereby he may require the claimant to give a bond in such amount and with such sureties as the commissioner may think wise to safeguard such interests, conditioned for the payment of any tax found to be due, with the interest thereon, and if such bond, satisfactory to the commissioner, is not given within such time as he prescribes the full amount of tax assessed shall be collected and the amount overpaid, if any, shall upon final decision of the application be refunded as a tax erroneously or illegally collected.

This covers against any insolvency or failure in business or promptness to pay the tax. The Government is secured absolutely, and the Treasury Department, of the revenues which are delayed in their collection.

In substance the same provision applies to nonresident aliens and to domestic and foreign corporations, amending sections 5, 6, and 12 of the act of September 8, 1916, so as to be workable in its provisions, the amendment being worded in such a way as to be in consonance with the act or parts of the act that I have described.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I desired, but I wished to present this matter which I regard as of primary importance. It is important to the country that these enterprises shall continue at present and furnish war supplies. It is important from the war end that they shall be allowed to safeguard themselves against this loss which will result in bankruptcy as in the period of which I spoke, from 1865 to 1873, the eight-year period when there was a gradual shifting, and sometimes not so gradual, toward the latter end of the period, a shifting of the price from a higher to a lower level. It will when the war ends come in such a way, unless these safeguards are allowed, as to result in widespread distress. I will for a closing comment say that in 1865 to 1873 great disaster resulted and that now the disasters will be correspondingly greater, because of the colossal magnitude of the sums involved, the merchandise, and the great population that will be interested in the bankruptcy or solvency of these enterprises after the war period shall have closed.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have no thought or desire to address the Senate on the general aspects of the bill. I agree with what has been said by so many Senators who have already spoken here with reference to the work that has been done by the committee that has the bill in charge. In the main I agree with the conclusions of the committee and I am willing to accept them as my own and support the committee in nearly all respects.

But I would, Mr. President, elaborate just a little upon one of many thoughts that were suggested by the very eloquent and instructive address that has just been delivered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I refer particularly to his reference to what was done in England in the establishment of a prewar period. The Senator said they fixed there upon the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 as the prewar basis for arriving at a conclusion as to what constitutes war profits. Our committee in this bill have done the same thing.

I regard it as a little unfortunate, Mr. President, that those three years should seem in the very nature of things to be the ones that are selected for the fixing of those profits, for the reason that it is generally understood by all business men in this country that those years in the United States were for most businesses subnormal years. Neither 1911, 1912, nor 1913 were good years, and in certain sections of the country, in at least one of them, the year 1913 was positively calamitous. As was pointed out by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] the other day in his speech, in Ohio, Indiana, and a large part of Illinois in 1913 there was the greatest calamity that ever visited that section, the great flood. Take my own State, for instance. There was not a railroad in the State that made a dollar in 1913. There was scarcely a manufacturing concern or any other business enterprise that did not show a loss at the end of that year. In many instances it was nothing but the pluck and enterprise that is characteristic of the business men of that section that buoyed those concerns up and brought them through at all. Yet 1913 is one of the years that is fixed here to establish a basis of prewar profits.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In looking at the report submitted by the committee I find that the aggregate net income of taxable corporations as reported to the Treasury Department is as follows:

In 1909, $2,095,978,000 plus.
In 1910, $3,360,000,000 plus.
In 1911, $3,213,000,000 plus.
In 1912, $3,832,000,000 plus.
In 1913, $4,339,000,000 plus.
In 1914, $3,619,000,000 plus.

So it would seem that the committee chose the three best years for the taxpayer of the years in which returns had been made under the act of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, that does not touch the point I am about to make at all. I do not know where the Senator got his figures, but I will accept them as accurate as they apply to the country generally; but they certainly do not apply to the section of which I speak, and that is a most important section of the country. Take those three or four States of the Central West—Indiana, Ohio, Illinois. They are all of them very great manufacturing States. They are not only agricultural States, but they are great manufacturing States as well, and what I have said of business conditions in those three States for the year 1913 is unquestionably true. I have not the figures at my command, but I know that that statement can not be successfully controverted.

I know also that the committee has endeavored to furnish some relief to those who are caught by that condition, where their business is in the situation I have described, by permitting them to take the average of other business of similar character and similar capital and basing their returns upon the returns of these other concerns. But, Mr. President, it can never be satisfactory for one man or for one establishment to take the business of another as its basis. I think that it would be very much fairer to permit each business to eliminate either one of those three years and take an average of the other two as the basis on which their war profits should be taxed. If that is done, then I think the only defect that I can particularly point out in the bill is met. I believe that that is only just and that it is very much fairer to a great many enterprises, and, I may say, nearly all the business in the States I have mentioned.

I hope the committee may yet see its way clear toward making provision that business may be permitted to eliminate either one of those three years from the making up of the average of its prewar basis.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. NEW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested by the Senator from Indiana, the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to announce that my college, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call discloses that 61 Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to know what title of the bill is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair replies that he is informed Title IX, known as consumption taxes, page 85.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to be heard when that section is considered. If the Senator from North Carolina has other amendments that he desires to offer, I will yield the floor for the present.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are some amendments that I desire to offer. I have no objection to the Senator proceeding, with the understanding that when he is through with his presentation I may present to the Senate two or three committee amendments that I desire to offer, about which I think there will be no controversy.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from North Carolina state now what those amendments are?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has an amendment relating to ethyl alcohol, approved by the department and sent up by it, and one other amendment relating to the taxes on tobacco and cigars and cigarettes. We have provided in the original bill that it should not go into effect on the floor stock until 10 days after the passage of the act. The department now says it ought to go into effect immediately.

On behalf of the committee, I move to strike out section 402, on page 41. The section reads as follows:

That so much of section 400 as imposes a tax upon cigars, and the whole of section 401, shall take effect 30 days—

The House had it; we changed it to 10—

after the enactment of this act. That section 404 and so much of section 400 as imposes a tax upon cigarettes and as relates to packages or parcels in which cigarettes may be put up shall take effect 90 days—

The House had it; we changed it to 10—

after the enactment of this act.

I ask for a reconsideration of that section. The amendments have already been adopted, and I shall move that that section be stricken out of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks no reconsideration is necessary. The Senator may move to strike out the section as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well; I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out all of section 402 as amended, at the bottom of page 41 and at the top of page 42.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like, with the permission of the Senator in charge of the bill, to now offer the following amendment on page 27. It is approved by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, after line 22, insert:

Under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, the manufacture, warehousing, withdrawal, and shipment, under the provisions of existing law, of ethyl alcohol for use of the United States or for denaturation, and denatured alcohol, may be exempted from the provisions of section 3283, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say, Mr. President, that this amendment is a modification of section 3283 of the Revised Statutes. In effect, that section requires distilleries to stop manufacturing distilled spirits at 11 o'clock p. m. on Saturday and to resume not earlier than 1 a. m. on Monday. That was very appropriate when spirits were being distilled for beverage purposes, but at the present time the War Department needs probably all of the ethyl alcohol that can be produced; and the purpose is to so amend the law that the work can be continued. The amendment is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I accept that amendment as a committee amendment. It has been considered and acted on by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now offer, to follow the amendment agreed to, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to, on page 27, it is proposed to insert the following:

Under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, manufacturers of ethyl alcohol for other than beverage purposes may be granted permission under the provisions of section 3285, Revised Statutes of the United States, to fill fermenting tubs in a sweet-mash distillery not oftener than once in 48 hours.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this is a proposition to modify section 3285 of the Revised Statutes. That section specifies 72 hours as the fermenting period at sweet-mash distilleries, and had its origin a good many years ago; but under the present improved method of distillation and production not more than 48 hours are required for that purpose. Therefore, there is a loss really of 24 hours. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends the change for the purpose of supplying the Government needs.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I accept that amendment as a committee amendment. The committee has acted upon it and adopted it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am receiving complaints about the increased tax on ethyl alcohol; and I ask the Senator if the committee has considered exempting ethyl alcohol used in medicinal preparations?

Mr. McCUMBER. That has been considered by the committee, of course, and is in another part of the bill. It has nothing to do with this amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator from North Dakota or the chairman of the committee inform the Senate whether anything has been done in that regard?

Mr. SIMMONS. We exempt it from the $1 additional tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota and accepted by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that I am not as yet through proposing amendments for the committee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Very well.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. NEW. Did I understand the Senator from North Carolina correctly to say that medicinal alcohol had been exempted from the additional $1 tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. It has been exempted from the $1 additional tax imposed by the Senate committee amendment, but not from the $1.10 additional tax. The Senator will, however, recall that after adding $1.10 to the present tax the committee later increased that by an additional $1.

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And from that additional $1 we have exempted alcohols which are used in the preparation of medicine.

Mr. NEW. I have an amendment covering that point which will be unnecessary if that has been done. If the Senator from North Carolina will just indulge me a little further, I desire to ask at what rate does that leave the present tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. At $2.20 a gallon as to alcohol used in the manufacture and preparation of medicine and at $3.20 for alcohol which is used for beverage purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that the Senator from Indiana will have no misunderstanding about the matter, I desire to say that I infer from what he stated to me the other day that he desired to offer an amendment in conformity with the requests of the druggists of the country.

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will say to the Senator that the druggists at the present time are asking that there be no additional tax whatever put upon alcohol which is used in the manufacturing of proprietary medicines.

Mr. LODGE. They want to change the House rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; they want to change the House rate. Of course, Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from North Carolina is in accordance with the terms of the bill as it now stands; but it is not what the druggists of the country want; in other words, they do not want to pay one cent more tax on alcohol than the $1.10 they are now paying under the present law. The House of Representatives, however, added $1.10 on all alcohol as an additional tax; then the committee of the Senate added, as the Senator from North Carolina has stated, $1 to the House tax on alcohol for beverage purposes, but let the tax remain upon alcohol used in all manufactures of whatever name or nature as provided by the House.

Mr. NEW. I thank the Senator. I wanted to have a thorough understanding as to how the amendment left this provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I give notice that in the Senate I shall demand a separate vote on the amendment offered by myself on yesterday relating to increased compensation for the officers and enlisted men of the United States Army while engaged in foreign service.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on page 90, line 4, I wish to offer an amendment. For that purpose, I move to reconsider the action of the Senate in adopting the Senate committee amendment beginning with line 25, on page 89, and going down to line 8, on page 90.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment referred to was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I move to strike out the word "four," in line 4, page 90, of the Senate committee amendment, and to insert the word "six." I will say to the Senate that the purpose of this amendment is to allow retailers and jobbers, having in their possession distilled spirits, six months instead of four months in which to pay this floor-stock tax. In the present bill we allow them four months on condition that they execute to the Government a bond to secure the Government for the tax. It was represented to us that four months was too short a period of time within which to pay the large amount which a great many of them will have to pay. We submitted the question to the department, and the department advised us that it will not interfere at all with the revenues of the Government to allow six months. We have, therefore, extended the time from four months to six months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, on page 90, line 4, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 90, line 4, before the word "months," it is proposed to strike out "four" and to insert "six."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 92, after line 21, it is proposed to strike out section 1009 as reported by the committee—

Mr. SMOOT. Before the amendment is stated I move to reconsider the vote of the Senate by which the amendment inserting section 1009 was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 92, after line 21, it is proposed to strike out section 1009, as follows:

Sec. 1009. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, under regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, require all internal-revenue taxpayers, who are required by law to render returns, to pay without prior levy, assessment, or notice, and at the same time as the return is required to be made, or in monthly installments thereafter, any such internal-revenue tax or portion thereof, any provision of law fixing any other time as the time when such tax is due to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That the whole of such tax shall be paid before the expiration of the time fixed by law for such payment. All penalties provided by existing law for failure to render return and pay tax when due are hereby made applicable to any failure to pay the tax at the time required by such regulations.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Sec. 1009. That the Secretary of the Treasury, under rules and regulations prescribed by him, shall permit taxpayers liable to income and war-profits taxes to make payments in advance in installments or in whole of an amount not in excess of the estimated taxes which will be due from them, and upon determination of the taxes actually due any amount paid in excess shall be refunded as taxes erroneously collected: Provided, That at least one-fourth of such estimated tax shall be paid before the expiration of 30 days after the close of the taxable year, at least one-fourth within two months after the close of the taxable year, at least one-fourth within four months after the close of the taxable year, and the remainder of the tax due on or before the time now fixed by law for such payment. All penalties provided by existing law for failure to pay tax when due are hereby made applicable to any failure to pay the tax at the time or times required in this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Is there any provision in the bill which gives a discount in the event that the tax is paid during the first 30 days?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that several States have had experience along that line with very favorable results. A small amount—only 1 per cent—of discount has brought forth a large amount of revenue immediately.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the United States during these months will not be very greatly in need of revenue, and, therefore, we should not want to give any kind of premium upon such payments. The object of this amendment is to compel the payment of taxes—not at one time, but to spread the payments over four periods, so that the taxes, which will amount to $2,500,000,000, shall not be taken out of trade on one particular date.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I concede that the provision is a very good one, indeed, and I do not raise any objection to it; but I thought that a discount of a very small amount would bring large revenue immediately into the Treasury. I was in hope that the committee would offer such an amendment, but I do not ask for an amendment along that line.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I accept the amendment on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question in regard to a provision on page 26 which has been called to my attention, and which reads:

Sec. 302. That no distilled spirits produced after the enactment of this act shall be imported into the United States from any foreign country, or from the West Indian Islands recently acquired from Denmark (unless produced from products the growth of such islands), or from Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands—

And so forth.

Why does the bill permit the bringing in of distilled spirits from these West Indian Islands?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can give the Senator no reason for it except that it was stated that they constituted the chief export of the people of those islands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. To this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Anywhere.

Mr. SMOOT. Anywhere in the world. Outside of the sugar, such spirits constitute over 90 per cent of their exports.

Mr. PENROSE. At that, only a few thousand dollars' worth are produced.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount is something like $60,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Do these exports come to this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Some of them do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If we left that provision out we would not cut out their export of these spirits to other countries, and it occurred to some of us that, if we left this provision in it would encourage the centering of this business there and the export of the product to this country. We do not permit such spirits to come from Porto Rico or from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee would not have thought of permitting it to come from the Virgin Islands if the conditions were otherwise than they are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought there must be something unusual about the conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it amounts only to about $60,000; there are only a few people, comparatively speaking, on the islands, and their products are very limited.

Mr. PENROSE. In addition, Mr. President, it was thought, these islands having only been acquired by the Government within the last few months, that we should give them a cordial welcome and not oppress their commerce at the start. It is a very insignificant matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not like to welcome them in that way. I am not going to move to strike out the provision, but I hope when the matter gets to conference that it will be eliminated. I do not believe that we ought to allow such distilled spirits to come in.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the chief industry of those islands is the collection of bay leaves, from which they make bay rum and distill St. Croix rum. That is about the only industry they have, and if you take that away from them they will be almost at their wits' end to make a living.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we have guarded the amount that they can ship to this country or any other country by stating that the commodity must be "produced from products the growth of such islands."

Mr. BORAH. Are the islands being referred to the West Indian islands we have recently purchased from Denmark?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I am delighted now to find out why we purchased them.

Mr. PENROSE. They are a kind of oasis.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to perfect the committee's amendment, on page 107, line 1. The amendment referred to has not been acted upon. I move to strike out all after the word "title," in line 1, down to and including line 8, and to insert the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 107, beginning in line 1 with the word "The," the last word in the line, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 8, and insert:

If a fiscal year ends during 1916 or a subsequent calendar year for which there is a rate of tax different from the rate for the preceding calendar year, then (1) the rate for such preceding calendar year shall apply to an amount of each partner's share of such partnership profits equal to the proportion which the part of such fiscal year falling within such calendar year bears to the full fiscal year, and (2) the rate for the calendar year during which such fiscal year ends shall apply to the remainder.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is simply to clarify and make certain what seemed to be a little ambiguous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no further amendments to offer now. I presume that the first matter left open and not acted upon is the amendment of the committee relating to the taxes on coffee, tea, and sugar, known as consumption taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 85, beginning in line 16, the committee proposes to insert the following:

TITLE IX.—WAR EXCISE TAX ON COFFEE, TEA, COCOA, AND SUGAR.

SEC. 900. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—
(a) Upon all coffee or substitutes therefor produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 2 cents per pound, to be paid by the producer or importer;

(b) Upon all tea produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale (except impure tea, tea waste, tea siftings or sweepings, for manufacturing purposes in bond, pursuant to the provisions of the act of May 16, 1908), a tax of 5 cents per pound, to be paid by the producer and importer;

(c) Upon all crude cocoa produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 3 cents per pound, and upon all prepared or manufactured cocoa and chocolate imported and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 5 cents per pound, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer;

(d) Upon (1) all refined sugar refined or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, and (2) all sugar manufactured or imported, if suitable for consumption as an article of human food without further refining, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of one-half cent per pound, to be paid by the refiner, manufacturer, or importer;

(e) Upon all saccharine or similar products, glucose, grape sugar, sirup of cane juice, and molasses, produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of $2.50 per pound in the case of saccharine or similar products, one-fourth of a cent per pound in the case of glucose and grape sugar, 1 cent per gallon in the case of molasses (except beet molasses) and sirup of cane juice, testing by polariscope above 40° and not above 56°, and 2 cents per gallon in the case of molasses and sirup of cane juice testing above 56°, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer.

Upon all articles specified in this section, which on the day this act is enacted are held by a retailer (who does not sell them at wholesale) in a quantity in excess of 200 pounds in the case of coffee or substitutes therefor, 50 pounds in the case of tea, 500 pounds in the case of sugar, 100 pounds in the case of glucose or grape sugar, 50 gallons in the case of molasses or sirups, and 1 pound in the case of saccharine or similar products, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association, in any quantity, and which are intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid the taxes imposed upon such articles in this section.

Such tax shall be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as provided in section 1002 in the case of additional taxes upon articles upon which the tax imposed by existing law has been paid.

Only one tax under this section shall be paid with respect to any article, irrespective of change of form by manufacture or other process.

SEC. 901. That each such manufacturer, producer, refiner, or importer shall make monthly returns under oath to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business, containing such information necessary for the assessment of the tax, and at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

Upon the removal from the custody of customs officials of articles subject to a tax imposed by section 900, the tax shall be collected by the collector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 902. That so much of paragraph O of section IV of the act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, as authorizes a drawback upon sugar is hereby repealed.

Mr. BROUSSARD and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I have some amendments which I propose to offer to section 900. While I was not following the reading the Secretary read sections 901 and 902.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks an amendment is in order.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will ask the chairman of the committee, before offering my amendment to this section, if he will consent to my submitting an amendment relating to the question of advertisements of ethyl alcohol, to come in on page 99 of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would have no objection, if unanimous consent is given, and provided it does not interfere with the rights of the committee to have its amendments first considered. I do not think it would do that if unanimous consent were given to the Senator to offer the amendment at this time.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the chairman of the committee that the amendment which I propose to offer is to permit the advertisement of ethyl alcohol for governmental, medicinal, mechanical, and other purposes. In the Post Office appropriation bill enacted during the present year an amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] was adopted prohibiting the advertisement of potable alcohol. The Post Office Department has construed that provision in the appropriation bill to mean that no one shall advertise alcohol to be used for scientific, mechanical, or governmental purposes. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has given consideration to this subject and has made a favorable report on a bill which is now on the calendar. It is only for the purpose of permitting the formulation by the Post Office Department of rules and regulations and to expedite action on their part that I offer the amendment to this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make no objection to the Senator offering the amendment under the statement he has made.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 99, just prior to Title XII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Sections 1105 and 1106 have been stricken from the bill and a new section 1105 inserted. So the amendment proposed will be section 1106, will come in at the end of Title II, and will read as follows:

SEC. 1106. That section 5 of the act approved March 3, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1918," shall not be construed to apply to ethyl alcohol for governmental, scientific, medicinal, mechanical, manufacturing, and industrial purposes; and the Postmaster General shall prescribe suitable rules and regulations to carry into effect this proviso in connection with the act of which it is amendatory.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say that I myself do not see any objection to that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Secretary read the amendment again. I did not hear plainly a part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, do I understand that amendments to section 900 of the bill are now in order?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOLLIS. The committee amendment is evidently a motion to strike out one section of the House bill and to substitute therefor three sections. Therefore it must be treated as one amendment, and it should properly be read entirely.

I understand that if the committee amendment as it now stands is substituted for the House provision, then thereafter it will be impossible for the Senate as in Committee of the Whole to amend the House provision. Having adopted the motion to strike out and insert, the Senate will have acted finally on the matter, and therefore those who are opposed to both the House provision and the committee amendment will vote down the committee amendment and then vote to strike out the House provision.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I understand that section 900 is not an amendment to any provision of the House bill. This section is an entirely new section.

Mr. HOLLIS. It is a motion to strike out section 900 of the House bill and to insert sections 900, 901, and 902. That is the committee amendment. Section 900 of the House bill is now before us for action. We have got to act on it. The committee propose to strike out section 900 and insert new matter for it. Both the House section and the committee substitute are now open to amendment in any particular; but after the substitute has once been adopted it can not thereafter be amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand this to be in the nature of a motion to strike out and insert. The House bill did have a section—namely, section 1000—which is designated as “coffee and tea,” but that was only a tax upon floor stocks of coffee and tea. The House had imposed a tariff tax of 10 per cent ad valorem on coffee, tea, sugar, and various other things; and then, to catch the stock already on hand, it imposed a floor tax upon coffee and tea. That we have stricken out; and after striking that out, we have proposed an independent section which imposes an excise tax upon coffee, tea, and other things.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, do I understand the chairman of the committee to state that section 1000 of the House bill has been stricken out on his motion?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my understanding—that that has already been stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been acted upon and agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS. If that has been done, then the proposition now is to add a new title to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; to add a new title to the bill. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that section 900 of the House bill was the war estate tax.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should have said section 1000. I was misled by the numbering here.

Mr. SMOOT. So this is an entirely new provision.

Mr. HOLLIS. I will ask the Chair whether section 1000 of the House bill has been stricken from the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that both section 1000 and section 1001 have been stricken from the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then the committee amendment is to add a new title to the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair's understanding is that the committee's proposition now is to insert a new proposition entirely.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22 on page 85.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed committee amendment on page 85 it is proposed to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22, which read:

(a) Upon all coffee or substitutes therefor produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 2 cents per pound, to be paid by the producer or importer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, in reference to this matter I have just a few remarks to submit to the Senate, and in doing so I shall try to be very brief.

Practically all of the coffee consumed in this country is imported from Porto Rico and from Brazil. The tax imposed by the section just read involves the development of one of the possessions of the United States, the island of Porto Rico. I am doing service on the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico; and during the last session that committee was charged with the duty of providing a new organic law for the island, under which recently a legislature has been elected, and is now, I believe, in session at San Juan. The committee while studying conditions in the island at the last session of the Congress, and while looking to the preparation of this organic law, naturally investigated the question of the finances of the island. The committee found that the island treasury was not in a prosperous condition—so much so that the governor of the island, a very distinguished citizen of this country from the State of Kentucky, repeatedly appeared before the committee to explain the difficulties the people of Porto Rico had in raising sufficient money to properly administer the government of the island. At that time the question arose as to whether there should be a provision in the bill looking to the establishment of prohibition in the island, and the governor, who classed himself before the committee as a partisan Prohibitionist, protested against the committee including any such provision in the bill. He said that in Kentucky he had participated in practically all of the campaigns that had led to making dry a large portion of the State, and that he was looked upon in that part of the country as a fanatic on the question; that he did not abate a particle from his position upon the liquor question, but he felt that the revenues that were then being collected and are now being collected in Porto Rico from internal-revenue taxes were necessary if the government was to continue to operate. He said that the internal-revenue taxes collected in Porto Rico were practically the entire revenues that the government had at its disposal to administer the affairs of the island.

However, there was put in the organic law a provision permitting the people of Porto Rico to vote upon that question. Recently an election has been held in the island, and a substantial majority was given in favor of prohibition, so that very shortly the island will be prohibition territory. The question then will be, after the internal-revenue taxes have been lost to the government of the island, how to raise sufficient revenue to administer its affairs. Everyone knows that the island of Porto Rico produces principally sugar, coffee, and tobacco. Coffee is one article of consumption in this country that has not advanced in price with the war, due to the closing of the German market for coffee. The island, in order to raise sufficient revenue to administer her affairs, the moment prohibition is put in force and the revenue from liquor is lost, will have to turn to other methods of taxation. The legislature of the island, just starting in its operation, will have to find the means to finance the government.

In Cuba recently the Government has found it necessary to put a tax upon sugar, and a tax is now being collected upon every sack of sugar that is produced in that island, that money being found necessary to meet the increased expenditures and the loss of tariff taxes due to the lack of the bottoms to carry to that country as large a commerce as Cuba enjoyed before the war. Porto Rico will have the same conditions; and it is probable that in addition to the taxes put upon the production of tobacco in the island, internal revenue taxes will have to be put both upon sugar and upon coffee. It does not seem fair that the Congress of the United States should now single out this industry of the island of Porto Rico and impose a tax for the benefit of the Government of the United States, which is amply able to get revenue from other sources, and deprive the people of Porto Rico of the opportunity of putting that tax upon the production of coffee, if indeed any tax should be put on coffee by either this Government or the government of Porto Rico.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator understand that under this provision coffee brought into this country from Porto Rico would have to pay a tax of 2 cents a pound?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, I understand that; yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I spoke to the chairman of the committee a moment ago, and he did not seem to have that view.

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is to be paid by the producer of the coffee, no matter where he produces it, if he brings it into the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But when it comes from one of our own possessions that is not the case, is it? Oh, I see; it uses the word “produced” as well as the word “imported.”

Mr. BROUSSARD. I want to suggest to the Senator from Washington that there is the same provision as to the tax on sugar; and it is intended to apply to domestic producers of sugar, just as the tax on coffee would apply to domestic producers of coffee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see. I had not noticed that the word “produced” was there in addition to the word “imported.”

Mr. BROUSSARD. So there is no question about it. The tax is put on the production of coffee in Porto Rico. That is our only possession in which we grow coffee to any considerable extent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just had in mind the word “imported.”

Mr. BROUSSARD. To review the brief argument that I am making, I believe that if any internal-revenue tax should be imposed upon coffee at all, Congress should not impose it upon the coffee produced in Porto Rico; that source of revenue ought to be left to the legislature of the island, which has just been organized, and is seeking to establish the fact that those people are competent to administer their affairs. If we proceed at this end to exercise the power to tax the production of the island at this time, their production of coffee and their production of sugar, we deprive them to that extent of the means by which the island can become self-administering. We are testing the ability of those people to govern themselves. The committee that had charge of the bill at the time believed that the people of the island were competent to administer their own affairs, and their affairs have been turned over into their hands; and I do not think it would be wise as a governmental policy for Congress to resort to that method of taxation just at this time, at least.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Can the Senator tell me just what amount of revenue this tax on coffee would raise, and what it would cost the Porto Ricans?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No, I can not; nor has the committee given us any figure with regard to it, except the lump sum to be raised by section 900, which is estimated to be about eighty-five or eighty-six million dollars. That includes coffee, cocoa, sugar, etc.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana what portion of the coffee consumed in this country we get from Porto Rico?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I can not answer that question either. Probably the chairman of the committee can answer the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we get about 85 per cent. of all of our coffee from Brazil, and very little from Porto Rico; probably not over 5 or 10 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. I am advised that I have overestimated it. We get nothing like as much as 5 per cent from Porto Rico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold his remark for a minute until I make this observation with reference to the observation of the Senator from North Carolina. While very little of that coffee may find its way into our market, this is a tax upon the production of coffee, and it does not make any difference that the coffee of Porto Rico is preferred in Spain and Austria, and almost all of it goes to Europe; the tax will have to be paid anyhow. The argument I am making is that a tax ought not to be imposed in that way, but that the legislature of Porto Rico should be permitted to impose a tax for its own purposes.

I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only wanted to say that, as the Senator from Louisiana probably is aware, the Porto Rican coffee is considered in Europe to be a very fine coffee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know that.

Mr. LODGE. For some reason, since we have possessed the island, and there has been every opportunity to put it on this market, the American consumer does not care for it and does not like it, and there is scarcely any Porto Rican coffee sold in this country. They are suffering very much now because their European market—especially the Austrian market, which used to take most of their coffee—is closed to them. They have suffered very much on that account. Personally, I should have no objection in the world to exempting the Porto Rican production, because the tax falls on them whether we consume it or not.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Exactly. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Knowing the peculiar situation of the island, I think their production of coffee might well be exempted. It is a very small matter.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for his observation. I want to say that I am informed at New Orleans, which is the largest coffee port of the country, that strenuous efforts are being made to introduce Porto Rican coffee into general consumption in this country; and it ought to be consumed in this country. It is the best coffee. There is no question about that. Before the island belonged to us, that coffee had a market in Europe, and it continues to flow in that direction; but the interruption of traffic between Porto Rico and Europe of course has caused the market to depreciate, and the people of Porto Rico are now seeking to get their coffee introduced into this country. We should not hamper them in an effort to find a new market at this time by putting that kind of taxation upon the coffee of Porto Rico.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator is simply to exempt from this tax, coffee that comes from Porto Rico, as I understand.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I want to say something with regard to the coffee from Brazil as well. I think the coffee from Porto Rico should be exempted, but I think we should not put any tax on coffee coming here from Brazil; and I hope I may make it clear to the Senator that such a tax should not be imposed, any more than a tax upon Porto Rican coffee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's amendment is to strike out the committee tax on coffee entirely.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The coffee tax; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that as far as I am concerned I think an amendment ought to be accepted by the committee exempting Porto Rican coffee from the tax, but I certainly could not agree with the Senator as to exempting Brazilian coffee from the tax.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I want to say to the Senator that if I am unable to have the entire clause rejected I shall certainly offer an amendment to exempt Porto Rican coffee; but I think I may be able to convince the Senator from Utah that I am as correct with reference to the tax upon Brazilian coffee as I am with regard to Porto Rican coffee. If the Senator will bear with me, I think I can show that we ought not to impose that sort of taxation.

Brazil is one country in South America that has been in thorough and in entire sympathy with the American Government from the day this Government declared war upon Germany. A very large portion of the population of Brazil is of German extraction and German birth. The Government of Brazil has withstood every effort made by the German Government to enlist its sympathies with the central powers as against us in this war. In the face of this large settlement of the country by Germans, and in the face of every effort made by the German Government to prevent the Government of Brazil from sympathizing, at least, with us, the Government of Brazil has loaned its navy, if I may use the term, to the Government of the United States, and the coast of the United States is now being patrolled by the navy of Brazil in cooperation with the Navy of the United States.

Why, only yesterday, as I read in this morning's newspaper, American marines and Brazilian marines were parading the streets of Rio de Janeiro together amid the cheers of the entire populace. Their ships are with us in this war. The efforts made daily by Germany, as reported in the newspapers, to secure at least the neutrality of Brazil, have proved unavailing. Recently, as a result of the diplomatic communications between Argentina, the sister Republic of Brazil, and the German Government, in regard to the sinking of one of the Argentine ships, the Toro, the friction that existed has been adjusted for the time being; and, according to the newspaper accounts, there was considerable rejoicing in Argentina over the victory of the Argentine Government in their negotiations with the German Government. So that while Brazil, although she has not yet declared war upon Germany, is cooperating with us in every way to make a success of this war and obtain victory for ourselves—though that is going on at this time, we turn around and undertake to impose a tax on the Brazilian producers of coffee in order to carry on this war.

What is the condition of the coffee market in Brazil? The coffee of Brazil has been coming to this country, but a great deal of it has been going to Europe as well. Some years ago the entire production of coffee in Brazil was financed in Europe, with the understanding that the countries that had financed Brazil in the production of coffee would have some advantage upon the market in Brazil. The war has practically closed the European market, so that coffee growing in Brazil is a languishing industry. Coffee has not advanced in price; on the contrary, the price of coffee has been reduced, not only there but in this country since the war began.

Here on the one hand we are striving to establish a policy with regard to the American Republics to the south of us, by which we are to secure their cooperation, as has already been done in the case of Central America. Republic after Republic has opened up her waters to our fleet in order that we might the better protect this continent. Guatemala has opened her waters to us, under a policy which we have convinced her people was their policy with regard to this war. Honduras has opened her waters to us, and our fleet may go in safety into the harbors of Honduras. Even the Republic of Costa Rica, which our Government has persistently refused to recognize, has opened her waters to us. We have tried in every possible way to induce all of those countries to join us in an effort to present the solid front of all of America against the policy of the German Empire.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to make a correction of what I stated a few moments ago with regard to Porto Rico. It may not be exactly a correction; but since making the statement that I was in favor of exempting Porto Rico, I remember that both Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands have their own internal-revenue laws. That being the case, this tax on coffee would not apply to Porto Rico. Therefore I will say to the Senator that it is not necessary to make an amendment to relieve the Porto Rican coffee-growers from the tax, because under existing law they have the right to make their own internal-revenue laws, and we collect nothing from them.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am sorry to disagree with the Senator with regard to his construction of this matter; but I will not discuss that matter now. I will come to it directly. I want to discuss the point that I was making with regard to Brazil. I want to compare our policy as written in these three lines toward the Republic of Brazil, notwithstanding her participation with us in trying to make this war a success, with the treatment that the American Government has received at the hands of the little Republic of Cuba.

The same policy that we extend to all of these Governments, the policy by which we expect to see all 21 of these Republics stand as one republic when attacked from abroad, has brought Cuba to a declaration of war against Germany. Cuba has tendered the services of her small military force to aid us in this war. Cuba has taken the vessels seized in her ports after her declaration of war with Germany, and not only has abstained from selling or lending them to us, but has turned those ships over to our Government without compensation to help us in this war. That is the treatment that one of these small Republics has given us at this time, when we need a coalition of all the American Republics. While we are receiving this treatment at the hands of all five of the Central American Republics and at the hands of Cuba in assisting us to carry on a successful war with Germany, we are busy now trying to put a tax upon the production of coffee in Brazil by which we expect to derive some of the money out of which to conduct this war.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the policy or attitude of Brazil toward this country in regard to levying taxes upon American products that are exported to Brazil?

Mr. BROUSSARD. At this time?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, her policy has not changed. She is conducting her government with the same system of taxation under which she conducted it before this war began. They have not imposed any additional hardship on us; but we, while receiving the cooperation and the assistance of Brazil, are telling her that she ought to pay more taxes upon the production of her own leading agricultural product.

The committee, in its report with regard to this tax, uses this language at page 17 of the report:

It is by no means probable, however, that the whole of these excise taxes will be passed to the consumer. A considerable part is likely to be absorbed by producers and dealers, and the final charge upon consumers can not be burdensome.

The committee itself expects this tax to be passed on to the man who is producing coffee in Brazil. It says specifically in its report that the consumer is not going to pay all of this tax, but that the importers and the jobbers will pass it back to the people who are producing the coffee. I ask Senators, in all candor, whether we should at this time impose this tax, which yields just a driblet compared with the amount of money necessary to carry on this war, and at least cause a stifling of the friendly sentiment in Brazil, and a disposition to reverse the policy which we are applauding at this end of the continent? Do not Senators believe that a little tax of this character and a statement of this kind issued by a committee of the Senate will be used at once by every agent of Germany in Brazil to point out that while they are lending their fleet to us to defend our coast, while they are applauding our marines marching with theirs in the capital of their country, while they are lending every possible assistance, moral, financial, and physical, toward our success in the war with Germany, we are seeking to make them pay taxes out of which to conduct this war? Do not Senators believe that the amount to be derived from taxes of this character is too insignificant for the great Senate of the United States, for the great Government of the United States, to stoop to collect coppers at this time out of the people who are producing coffee in Brazil?

As I said awhile ago, I do not agree with the Senator from Utah (Mr. Smoot) that because the legislature of Porto Rico has a right to impose internal revenue taxes in Porto Rico, the wording of the provision in this bill will exclude Porto Rico from the operation of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator let me read the law, and then see if it is not so?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, section 9 of the act of March 2, 1917, reads as follows:

That the statutory laws of the United States not locally applicable, except as hereinbefore or hereinafter otherwise provided, shall have the same force and effect in Porto Rico as in the United States, except the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator mean that under the fourth section of this paragraph, section "(d)," imposing a tax on sugar, that the people of Porto Rico will not have to pay the tax on the production of sugar in Porto Rico?

Mr. SMOOT. They will not have to pay the tax upon the production of sugar.

Mr. BROUSSARD. They certainly will; and the Senator knows that this report is to the effect that the tax will have to be paid by the producer of sugar, whether he produces it here or imports it; and so it is with coffee. You are putting a tax upon the production and the importation of coffee.

When coffee comes from Brazil you tax it when you import it from Brazil. When it comes from Porto Rico you tax it. If the coffee was produced in Utah you would have to pay the tax in Utah just as under the same provision you would have to pay a tax in Utah on the production of sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator did not wait until I had answered fully about sugar. Of course if all the coffee, or any great portion of coffee, came from Porto Rico into this country it would be burdensome, as they would pay the two cent tax. Almost all the Porto Rican sugar comes here.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him—

Mr. SMOOT. Wait a moment. The Senator in an earlier statement made, as I remember it, I may have misunderstood him, said that not only under this provision would Porto Rico have to pay the 2-cent tax upon the little coffee she sends into this country but upon coffee that may be shipped to Europe.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. That cannot be possible in my opinion under the law. I am in full accord with what the Senator wants to arrive at. I know Congress has the power to repeal the existing law, but under existing law the Porto Rican would not have to pay any tax whatever upon the production of coffee in Porto Rico that would be shipped to England or Austria or any European country.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I simply do not agree with the Senator from Utah. The Senator read the organic law of the islands. I am familiar with that act. I helped to draft it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator will telephone to the department the department will tell him that, as I have stated the case, the department would rule that there would be no tax upon coffee raised in Porto Rico that may be shipped to a European country or any other country of the world outside of the United States.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If the department rules that way the department will rule in face of the law. The law puts a tax on the production of coffee and says that whoever produces coffee shall pay the tax, and that will be the case if the law is honestly administered. The Senator refers to the law enacted at the last session. It is very true that Congress there said what he read, but Congress is now speaking through this bill, and imposes a tax on the production of coffee wherever coffee is produced in this country, as well as every pound of coffee imported into this country. The Porto Rican coffee falls within the jurisdiction of this provision of the law and is susceptible to the tax. I do not care what the department may in advance say what it will do, the wording is too plain for anyone not to understand it. This puts a tax upon the producer of coffee in the United States and next upon the importer of coffee produced outside the United States.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I agree with the construction of the law expounded by the Senator from Louisiana, and I am sorry to have to disagree with the Senator from Utah in what he says will be the ruling of the department. Porto Rico in passing her legislation simply passes it by the delegated authority vested in it by the Congress of the United States, which has the original paramount jurisdiction. The Supreme Court of the United States has time after time, in case after case, held with reference to the Territories of the United States—the Territory of New Mexico, the Territory of Utah, other Territories that have since come in as States—that Congress might have vested them with absolute power in local legislation, but that whenever Congress itself legislated upon that subject the act of Congress would supersede any act of the local legislature, Congress having original jurisdiction.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am very glad the Senator from New Mexico has confirmed the statement, because the Senate is aware of the fact that the Senator from New Mexico is very familiar with this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that fact, but the statement the Senator makes that this act will repeal the law of March 2, 1917, I think is an error. We are not repealing that law. It is the law that specifically exempted the internal-revenue law as applying to Porto Rico.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am very familiar with that act. I played a humble part in drafting it. The Senator is referring to another revenue law. This is an internal-revenue tax. Internal-revenue taxes are collected. In these times these are special taxes, to which that article has no reference at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that if the law did not except Porto Rico, as did the statute which the Senator read on the same subject it would repeal the law which the Senator has just read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi to show wherein the repeal is provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is not necessary to state it. At the time at which the law is passed if there is any conflict with what the Senator has read—

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a conflict with the law as I have read it, applying to the coffee that may be imported into the United States, because there is a proviso as the Senator will remember the provision already read, which states that the internal-revenue law shall apply to goods produced in Porto Rico shipped into the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But there is no exception in the law which the Senator from Louisiana is now discussing, and without that exception, of course, being on the same subject, it will repeal the law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah does he contend that as to Porto Rico there would be no tax whatever upon sugar under this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Utah does not, but the Senator from Utah contends that if Porto Rico shipped her sugar to England or to Austria or to France, or to any other country in the world outside of the United States the tax would not apply. I stated that when the coffee from Porto Rico which goes to European countries or any other country in the world outside of the United States it will not be taxed. There is such a little amount of coffee from Porto Rico imported into the United States that it amounts to very little, and I want even that little to be exempted from taxation. That is exactly the position the Senator from Utah takes.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL. I suggest to my colleague that unless his contention about this provision is correct, the Finance Committee has certainly done a vain and useless thing in providing a tax on coffee produced somewhere, because Porto Rico is the only place I know of within the jurisdiction of the United States where coffee is produced in any quantity.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me see if I can not make this thing clear. Here is a tax upon all coffee of 2 cents a pound. By whom is it to be paid? It is to be paid by the producer or importer. A tax of 2 cents upon all coffee is to be paid, is the wording of the provision, the very words written into the law by the committee of which the Senator from Utah is a member. To be paid by whom? To be paid by the producer or the importer. Now, there can be no doubt about that. If a man imports coffee into the United States he owes 2 cents a pound on that coffee, if this becomes a law. If a man produces a pound of coffee in the United States he owes 2 cents a pound under this law. There can be no other construction. The fact that after he has produced it he sells it somewhere else than in the United States has nothing whatever to do with the matter. The fact of the production is the fact of the taxation, and there can be no difficulty in construing language so plain as this.

Just apply it to the succeeding section, the tax upon sugar. The tax upon sugar is to be paid by the manufacturer, the producer, the refiner, the importer. There can be no question that if a man produced a pound of sugar in Porto Rico he owes the tax. If he exports it to the United States he owes the tax. If he exports it direct to England he owes the tax. Why? Because he has produced that pound of sugar, he has manufactured that pound of sugar, and in the same sense the Senator says, of course, he will have to pay the tax on the sugar because that sugar comes mostly into the United States; but he will not have to pay a tax on coffee because most of it goes elsewhere. I say the question of the disposal of coffee or of sugar is not material as to the tax that is imposed upon sugar being manufactured in Porto Rico, whether it is consumed in the United States, in the island, or in some other foreign country. I say the tax upon the coffee is imposed upon the production of the coffee and it is immaterial whether the coffee is consumed in the island, whether the coffee finds its way into the continental United States, or whether the coffee is taken to Spain or somewhere in Europe to be consumed. The tax is upon production, and there should be no difficulty in establishing the intent of the committee from the words as they appear in the provision.

Of course, the Senator from Utah says if it is subject to that construction he is willing to exempt the production of coffee in Porto Rico. I say if the Senate does not see fit to strike out this entire provision with regard to coffee I shall offer an amendment to exclude the coffee of Porto Rico from the operation of this law, for I believe there is more principle involved in the proposition of not taxing Brazilian coffee than there is even in the taxing of Porto Rican coffee. The fact that I do not want to see Porto Rican coffee taxed is one of finance; it is an administrative matter. I am not opposed to the people of Porto Rico taxing coffee if they need that source of revenue to administer their government, but the result of taxing the coffee from Brazil would probably be to stir up opposition in that section of the country where the population seems to be united with us in carrying on this war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I heartily concur in what the Senator said as to Porto Rico, but it does seem to me if we extend this favor to Brazil we have got to extend it to the sugars of Cuba, because Cuba has been most loyal. Not only that, but it seems to me that we ought to extend it to China, for China is most loyal. I am not very much in favor of these consumption taxes at all, but if we are going to make a discrimination in favor of Brazil it seems to me that we would have to make it in favor of India and also in favor of the sugars of Cuba.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to state to the Senator that I am thoroughly in accord with him. I do not believe any of these taxes should be imposed. I think the time may come when we should resort to consumption taxes and to production taxes. The time may come—I hope it may not come—when there are other sources of revenue to which we will turn in this country for taxation. But the error the Senator from Colorado makes is in stating that if we strike out the tax on Brazilian coffee we are favoring Brazil. We are not doing any such thing. We propose an injustice against Brazil by writing this provision in the law and I am now seeking to keep us from perpetrating that injustice upon a friendly people. I agree with the Senator that we ought not to place this excise tax on the sugar of Cuba in addition to the tariff taxes that we maintain upon the sugar produced in that country. Cuba, exercising her right to administer her own affairs, has already put a tax on the production of sugar for the very purpose of defraying her expenses incidental to participation in the war against Germany, and not for any other purpose—not to administer her ordinary affairs, but for the purpose of being able to lend financial and physical assistance to the Government of the United States in the war with Germany. While she is doing that we should not turn around and put taxes upon the agricultural products upon which depends absolutely the prosperity and the happiness of the people of Cuba. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that the entire provision should be taken out. But I have to meet the question as it is presented to us.

The first provision of the section which is entirely objectionable to me is the section with regard to coffee. Therefore, I have offered an amendment to strike that out. I have hopes that we may strike out these individual sections and that no one in the Senate will agree to support any part of section 900. I am reaching this just as it is presented to me. I am asking the Senate to vote out the coffee tax because the coffee comes from Porto Rico and Brazil. I believe we ought to strike out the tax on tea for the reasons advanced by the Senator, and for the further reason that we should not at this time, when every power within the Constitution is being exerted by the Government to reduce the cost of everything that goes upon the table; when we are straining, we may say our consciences, to give power to individuals to cope with the high price of living at one end of the Capitol, and at the other end of the Capitol we should not proceed to levy consumption taxes and then say that we do so because somebody else will pay the tax.

It is to the statement contained in the report of the committee, that it is the hope of the committee that this tax on coffee will be put upon the people of Brazil, that I addressed myself when I said we should not discriminate against Brazil. We have every reason to be grateful to Brazil for her attitude, and we should extend to her a hand of friendship and not a hand of taxation as it is proposed to do by the three lines which I have moved to strike out.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, by what kind of logic is it claimed that this tax would be paid by Brazil ultimately? Why is it not true, as it has always been true, at least a Democratic truth, that the consumer in this country always pays the tax?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that the tax, in my judgment, will be entirely paid by the consumer. The coffee tax will be paid by the consumer of coffee. I will say further that the importer of coffee in this country will pass that tax back to the people who produce coffee in Brazil, and it is, I imagine, upon that assumption that the committee uses the language I have quoted, that a part of the tax will be passed to the consumer.

Mr. REED. How will it be passed?

Mr. BROUSSARD. The importers can combine. There can be no trouble about that. We understand that the number of importers is not very large. Practically all the coffee that comes into the United States comes in to the port of New Orleans and the port of New York and every coffee importer knows every other coffee importer. They can easily pass it.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to break in the Senator's argument, but I am really interested in this new and strange project. It seems to me strange, and I do not say the Senator is the author of it, that a tax placed upon an article imported into the United States and which is solely produced outside the United States with no local rivalry is not paid by the consumer. It has always been a Democratic doctrine that a tariff tax is paid by the consumer. It has always been our doctrine that the amount of the tax was added to the price of the article. Now the Senator states that in his opinion that tax will be paid by the consumer and that, nevertheless, it will be passed back to the producer because there are only a limited number of importers. It seems to me with all respect to the Senator's argument that if there is so limited a number of importers that they can readily get together in order to impose this tax at both ends on the consumer here and then again on the producer in Brazil, that same crowd of gentlemen will fix prices to suit themselves regardless of whether we levy any tax or not. I do not think they need the tax to encourage them if they are ilk of that kind.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the Senator that the statement which I made was not meant to convey the idea that the importers of coffee would get together and do that. I quoted from the report made by the Finance Committee in which appears this language:

It is by no means probable, however, that the whole of these excise taxes will be passed to the consumer. A considerable part is likely to be absorbed by producers and dealers, and the final charge upon consumers can not be burdensome.

I was addressing myself to that part of the report. Then the Senator asked me by what logic I reached the conclusion that a part of the tax might be passed. I did not intend to convey the idea to the Senator that the importers of coffee would do so, but I was trying to explain how they could do it if there was an understanding. To illustrate this matter, to show that I am not romancing in assuming that situation, let me cite the Senator to a thing which to my knowledge is going on now with regard to this same provision of the law. Paragraph (b) of section 900 puts an excise tax on sugar. It is to my knowledge that that provision of the law says the tax is to be paid by the refiner, the manufacturer, or the importer, but a majority of the contracts already made in Louisiana to purchase the cane from the man who is tilling the ground, and who ought not to pay the tax under the wording of this law, include a clause passing this tax to the man tilling the ground, which reads as follows:

CONSUMPTION OR OTHER TAX CLAUSE.

It is agreed that in the event a consumption tax, or tax by whatever name, is imposed by the Government directly upon sugar prior to any settlement for cane under this contract, then in determining the price to be paid for the cane herein, the market price of sugar shall be ascertained as set forth on this contract and from the said market price shall be deducted the amount of tax imposed per pound upon the sugar, and the remainder shall be considered the true market price and form the basis of settlement under this contract.

Every member of the committee has received a letter quoting that clause in one of those contracts accompanied by a quotation from a letter in which the author of the letter, who is himself a producing manufacturer of sugar, who also grows part of the cane which he manufactures, states that he is not going to make any sugar that is going into direct consumption, but that he is going to make what is called 96 test raw sugar and sell this sugar to the refiner, and the refiner, he knows, will pass the tax on to him, though under the law the refiner has no right to do that. To protect himself, he is passing the tax by means of this clause in his cane contract onto the man who produces the cane. Those are facts which I cited to the committee, and I have written briefly a letter to each member of the committee calling their attention to it; and I propose if this paragraph is unfortunately left in the law to put in a penalty against doing that very thing of passing the tax on to the tiller of the soil who grows the cane.

Now, let me say to the Senator from Missouri, if because there are a few refiners in this country they are able to hold up the production of raw sugar in Cuba, Louisiana, Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, everywhere, to the extent that the man producing the sugar shall be held up just because of the excuse that he passes the tax on to the man who is selling him the cane, does he not believe that a few importers of coffee could, by proceeding under the methods adopted and pursued and persisted in by the refiners of the country, pass this tax to the poor man who is in Brazil harvesting coffee in the forest which he cultivates?

Mr. REED. It is barely possible that it may be collected at both ends. It is barely possible that the sugar men the Senator speaks of may undertake to relieve themselves of this tax and hand it back to the original producer. But it does not make any difference how many shifts they make of that burden; it will come back to the consumer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Absolutely.

Mr. REED. If you collect the tax in the first instance from the sugar refiner and the sugar refiner collects it back from the sugar producer, the sugar producer will necessarily exact a higher price because it increases his cost. So the burden will ultimately reach the man who consumes. It is of course true that a combination standing between the producer and consumer might collect toll at both ends, but when a combination is powerful enough to do that it is powerful enough to fix the price regardless of the question of tax.

I will not dispute the soundness of the Senator's general conclusion. Without committing myself on this clause at this moment, my present impression is that I shall vote against any consumption tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to infer that under the provisions of the bill the refiner is supposed to pay the tax.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I submit I do not want to discuss the sugar proposition. I used that as an illustration. I will discuss it directly, but I am discussing the coffee proposition now.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say, of course the bill provides who shall pay the taxes, not thinking that they are going to pay it out of their profits or anything of that sort, but that is the easiest way for the Government to collect the money. In other words, the Government is not going to wait until the sugar and coffee are distributed to the retailer and then by the retailer to the consumer and then make the consumer pay the taxes. The Government says the only way to do this is to collect it before it ever goes out of the refinery; that from every refiner, and there are only a few of them in the United States, we will collect all this tax before the sugar ever leaves the refiner.

Mr. BROUSSARD. As to the coffee tax, however, it provides that it shall be paid by the producer or importer.

Mr. SMOOT. We have no producers.

Mr. BROUSSARD. There are producers in Porto Rico where the American flag is floating over the Government house and the administration is American.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that in every law that is passed by Congress, if we have it apply to Porto Rico we specifically state that it shall, and also if we would have it apply to the Philippine Islands we have got to specifically state that it shall apply to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will not split hairs with the Senator from Utah. In the very article to which he refers, the very section 900 as written into the law, there is a tax which he says applies to Porto Rican sugar, and then he turns around and says when you refer to coffee you have got to write the word into the law to make it apply to Porto Rico. There is no use in discussing that sort of thing. Nobody can follow that sort of logic. Whether you write Porto Rico into the law or not you put a tax of two cents on coffee produced in Porto Rico. Unless you put the words "Porto Rico" into the law the Senator says it does not apply. I can not follow that kind of argument and I just refuse to follow it; that is all.

I wish to submit, Mr. President, that for the reasons which I have advanced I hope that the Senate will vote to strike out the coffee tax, and if the tax is retained I shall certainly not rely upon the construction placed upon the law by the Senator from Utah, but I shall vote for an exemption for Porto Rico.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield for one question? Primarily why should this tax be on Porto Rico?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Because the Porto Rican will pay it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would not the American consumer pay it?

Mr. BROUSSARD. He tries to pass it on. He will not succeed very well, for the reason that the crop of coffee in Brazil is far in excess of the available demand. Their market in Germany and Austria is lost. They can not now use that market and coffee is cheaper to-day than it sold before the war for that reason. So it is not to be expected. The difficulty of transportation has limited the market so that they can not pass that tax on to the consumer very well, but they will do it wherever they can.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me suggest to the Senator that coffee is probably the one article in all the list of articles where there is a wide margin between the imported price and the price at which it reaches the breakfast table. We know the proprietary names of the coffee and my recollection is, though I have not examined it recently, that there is a difference of something like five or six hundred per cent of margin in some of those popular brands of coffee. I have not very accurate knowledge on the subject, but it does seem to me from what little I know about it that probably coffee is one article that there will be the most chance to get a tax collected out of the very large margin that the middle men have in the price of coffee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That may happen, but will the Senator agree with me on this proposition: Will passing a law giving us so little revenue compensate us for establishing a reputation of trying to have Congress pass a law upon the product of Brazil exactly on the statement as given by the committee? Brazil is acting in conjunction with us in this war, and if there should be a law the purpose of the law is to pass the tax on to the producer. Is that policy justified at this time?

Mr. HARDWICK. Brazil, for instance, imposes an export tax on coffee. That is no offense to this country.

Mr. BROUSSARD. No.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is an additional burden to the American consumer, and eventually the American consumer has to pay it, unless the middlemen can absorb it, as they do in some instances; but, at the same time, that is not an offense to this country; and I do not see how, if we impose a tax on coffee here which is to be paid by our own consumers or by the middlemen who handle it, that can be any possible offense to Brazil or any possible injury to Porto Rico, or any other country producing coffee. That is just the idea I have about it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that he was not here when I made the argument.

Mr. HARDWICK. That was my misfortune.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I regret not to go over it again; but I do not want to detain the Senate by repeating what I have said. I pointed out, let me say to the Senator, the active cooperation of Brazil with this country in this war, and, while I do not believe that this provision itself would result in inciting a disposition not to continue that help, yet the people who are inciting Brazil against this cooperation, the agents of the German Government, who have been at work in that Republic since the inception of the war, would pounce upon this fact and point out that we were seeking to put a burden upon her, while she was trying to help this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, we always have that trouble everywhere in this world; we can not keep people from misrepresenting what we do; but my idea is that when the people in Brazil who produce coffee find that it is not going to cost them anything, no matter whether it cost the American consumer anything or not, there will not be much complaint.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If I may ask the Senator a question; he has stated that the difference between the retail price and the price the producer receives is 400 or 500 per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. In some cases.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If 2 cents a pound is added to the coffee will not the middlemen add that same 400 or 500 per cent additional to the amount which they have to pay?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so, because I think their margin of profit is so great for roasting and for the proprietary coffees that they can afford to absorb, and that the competition among them will probably induce them to absorb the tax.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But still the competition between them does not reduce their 400 or 500 per cent profit.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will let me tell him about how that is, so far as I know—and I have had some occasion to investigate it—a particular brand of roasted coffee becomes popular in certain communities and in certain localities, and for that reason the consumers are willing to give far more than what the real market value of the commodity is. I think that is true.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is always the case where a person has an amount invested, but he always tries to make the same amount of profit on all parts of his investment, and, for that reason, I think that these consumption taxes will result in the consumer paying a good deal more than the tax which is imposed.

Mr. BROUSSARD. There is no question about that. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that, while what he says is very true, the moment a man gets a reputation for supplying a particular kind of coffee, of a particular brand, wrapped up in a particular package, the price for that article, of course, becomes abnormal; there is lots of advertising connected with it, and there is an abnormal profit on it; but this tax is going to be collected from the man who imports coffee and with him there is not that margin of profit, because he is selling to the man who is putting up the package to which the Senator refers. So he will pass the tax on to the man who puts up the package, and immediately the man who puts up the package will not only want the tax back from the consumer, but the same ratio of profit that he had received on his investment in that coffee prior to the tax being imposed. That is my judgment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator may be right about that—I am not sure as to that; but in any event if this tax is passed on to the consumer it will amount to almost nothing when it gets to the consumer. It is a well-distributed tax, and it has the additional virtue, from my point of view at least, in relation to the tariff, that it is a tax on a noncompetitive product which can not be multiplied indefinitely by the domestic people who are producing the same kind of an article, and therefore the burden can not be increased several times over before it reaches the consumer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Georgia a question in regard to this matter. Does not the Senator believe that the time has not yet come to put consumption taxes on commodities in this country; that we had better wait and when there is need for consumption taxes take up the list of things that go upon the table and treat them all alike, and put a tax upon them? There is no necessity at the present time for such taxes. This bill has had a billion dollars added to it since it was reported by the Finance Committee, and the consumption taxes will raise less than $100,000,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the expenditures are constantly mounting, and we are called on now for a good many billion dollars more than we expected.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand that, and the time may come when we will have to resort to consumption taxes; and when that time comes, of course, coffee should not escape its share of taxation; it should be treated like every other commodity that we consume.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for a minute or two in opposition to the committee amendment. I do not believe there should be an excise tax on tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar, and I hope the committee amendment may be defeated. Up to this time I have heard no good reason given by any member of the committee or by any Member of the Senate why such a tax should be imposed.

I see from the report of the committee that it is expected to raise only about $86,000,000 from this title. When this measure was first considered I took the position that the revenues to be raised by it should come from war profits, large incomes, and luxuries. The Senate has already increased the tax on war profits and on incomes, and the record shows that the increase is very substantial. Under the House bill as it came to the Senate the amount to be raised by the excess-profits tax would have been $200,000,000 in addition to the amount now raised under existing law, which last year was $226,000,000, making a total of $426,000,000. The bill as it came to the Senate would have raised this year on war and excess profits $426,000,000 of taxes. The provision has been amended in the Senate so that now there will be raised the first year from excess profits $1,286,000,000. The bill as it came from the other House was so arranged as to raise $620,000,000 on incomes in addition to the amount raised under existing law, which would have brought the amount to $978,000,000. The bill as reported to the Senate would have raised an additional tax under existing law of $777,000,000. It has been amended in the Senate so that now there will be raised under the income-tax provisions $1,200,000,000.

But, Mr. President, there has been no change in the tax rates so as to raise any considerable amount from luxuries. I said in the speech which I made a few days ago that I had read in the newspapers that last year there were imported into this country over $500,000,000 worth of luxuries. It does seem to me that a tax could well be levied upon such luxuries that would bring to the Government at least $300,000,000. In addition to that there are many domestic luxuries that are not in any way taxed in this bill. It does seem to me that before a tax on consumption is resorted to luxuries should be taxed to the limit; and, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of striking out this provision placing a tax upon consumption and placing it upon luxuries.

There is another tax that might be levied if additional revenue is needed at this time, and that is a tax on large inheritances. A graduated inheritance tax on amounts over $100,000 would raise several million dollars; it would probably raise as much or more than will be raised by this tax on tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar.

I hope the Senate committee amendment laying an excise tax on consumption will be disagreed to, and I also hope that the House provision levying a tax on similar articles will be defeated.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I was gratified to hear the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] refer with approval to an inheritance tax. On yesterday I introduced an amendment to which I wish to call the attention of Senators. It provides for a progressive inheritance tax. It leaves to the States the amount of the inheritance tax imposed by the State. It prevents the owner of a very large estate transferring his political domicile to a State having no inheritance tax or a very small inheritance tax for the purpose of evasion.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to state that in the speech I made a few days ago I took the ground that an inheritance tax laid by Congress should be levied with due regard to the inheritance taxes of the various States.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator for the interruption. The proposal which I have submitted is that the United States in levying this tax shall rebate the amount of the State tax to the proper authorities of the State, and in that way a uniform tax would be placed upon legacies. I should like to read this amendment if I may be permitted. It is not long, and there are some things in it which I think the Senate ought to hear. It is as follows:

On page 78, after line 6, insert in lieu of Title IX, stricken out, the following:

TITLE IX—INHERITANCE TAX.

SEC. 900. That a legacy tax shall be, and is hereby, imposed upon the transfer of any right, title, and interest in or to any property, real or personal, by will, grant, or transfer in any manner, or under the interstate law of any State or Territory, or of the United States, from any person in anticipation of death, or of any person dying, who is seized or possessed of such property while a resident of the United States, or of any of its possessions; or when the property of such decedent lies within the United States, or within any of its possessions, and the decedent or grantor was a nonresident of the United States, or of any of its possessions, at the time of his death, in accordance with the following schedule, to wit:

Where the clear value of the entire estate is less than $100,000 it shall be exempt from legacy tax; otherwise, subject to the following duties, to wit:

Where the clear value of the entire estate is between $100,000 and $300,000, 1 per cent; between $300,000 and $500,000, 2 per cent; between $500,000 and $600,000, 3 per cent; between $600,000 and $700,000, 4 per cent; between $700,000 and $1,000,000, 5 per cent; and upon every excess in the clear value of such estate over and above $1,000,000 there shall be automatically added in addition to 5 per cent, and accumulative as to each additional increase, 1 per cent additional legacy tax to be laid upon each increase in the clear value of such estate of $1,000,000, or the major fractional part thereof, until such tax reaches 100 per cent cumulative duty upon such additional increase in the clear value of such estate: Provided, That when such estate, by will, devise, grant, or inheritance law, goes to collateral kin, there shall be imposed the following additional legacy tax upon such portion only of such estate as may descend to such persons severally, to wit:

Brothers and sisters, or their descendants, 3 per cent; uncles and aunts, or their descendants, 5 per cent; other persons, not children or parents, 10 per cent.

That follows the European system. I should like to say that this proposed law is in effect in all of the civilized nations of the world. The amendment further provides:

Any property conveyed, in anticipation of death, by any person, as a gift or grant to the extent conveyed without adequate consideration, where such estate would come within the rule imposed by this act, fixing such legacy taxes, such conveyance, gift, or transfer, however made, shall be subject to the legacy duty herein provided, as if it were the estate of a decedent, and the estate shall be chargeable therewith unless otherwise paid. Where corporate stocks or bonds are transferred or placed under a trust for transfer within five years previous to death, as a gift, either in whole or in part, to that extent such transfer shall be conclusive evidence of its character as a legacy: Provided, however, That property devised or bequeathed to any religious, educational, patriotic, charitable, or benevolent corporation or institution shall be exempt from legacy duty up to the amount of $1,000,000.

The legacy tax hereby imposed shall be a lien and charge upon the property of every person who may die as aforesaid, from the date of the death of such person, and shall be payable within one year, bearing 6 per cent from the date of the death for the first 12 months, and thereafter at the rate of 8 per cent until fully paid.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make rules and regulations for the collection of the same: Provided further, That out of such legacy taxes there shall be set apart to the credit of the State the amount of inheritance taxes imposed by the existing State law and paid over to the proper authorities of the State.

Mr. President, the proposed progressive inheritance tax in lieu of Title IX is intended not only to provide a very large revenue for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the war—and I think it will go into the hundreds of millions; no one can precisely say what it would be; but over half of the property of the United States, amounting to over $200,000,000, in all human probability, is owned by those who would be subject to this tax; and while we may think of an individual as not dying for the convenience of the Government, there is a constant stream of persons passing over the river who would be subject to this tax and the returns would be large.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Oklahoma, of course, realizes that the number of persons who die and who would be subject possibly to inheritance tax in one year is only a comparatively small percentage of the total which he indicates. The House increase on the inheritance tax, which we struck out, was estimated to yield $6,000,000; that is all. The inheritance tax is not a very large revenue producer, because it is so split up.

Mr. OWEN. I do not agree with the Senator at all. I think he is entirely in error in his estimate. I recall one estate, of which I think the country generally knows, that would under this proposal pay over $900,000,000.

Mr. STONE. One estate?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; one estate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not any doubt that the object and purpose of the Senator from Oklahoma are most excellent in trying to provide some kind of a preventive of people moving into other States to avoid inheritance taxes.

Mr. OWEN. That is one of the objects of the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the provision of the amendment which permits the State laws to govern the amount of taxes to be paid in the State, it seems to me, would be negative that.

Mr. OWEN. The amendment merely remits to them the amount that they would ordinarily receive.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I know, but they receive different amounts.

Mr. OWEN. Certainly they do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. One State imposes double or treble the rate in another State. It seems to me there ought to be some provision to the effect that it shall be uniform.

Mr. OWEN. We can not control the States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; but the Senator could frame it in this way: He could provide that the tax shall be a certain amount, and any State desiring to avail itself of the war provisions of this proposed act shall so signify and agree not to enforce any inheritance tax within the State. That would put the collection in the hands of the Federal Government. That would economize enormously the cost of collecting the tax, and would also prevent the practice of a certain class of people moving from one State to another, in order to avoid the necessity of paying the inheritance tax.

Mr. OWEN. It has only been within the last year when an estate of $60,000,000 escaped the New York inheritance tax by its owner transferring his domicile to New Hampshire. Take the Weyerhaeuser estate, which is estimated at, I think, a thousand million dollars.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was stated that one of the great capitalists of the State of Michigan came to the District of Columbia because there was no inheritance tax imposed here, and that his estate amounted to $20,000,000.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I started to say when interrupted, the proposed progressive inheritance tax in lieu of Title IX, is intended not only to provide a very large revenue for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the war, but particularly as a means of correcting the results of long abuse of organized monopolies in the United States which has resulted in establishing in the United States a financial, commercial, and business overlordship which has unduly, unfairly, and with great injustice been able to impose its will upon the industrial life of the United States through the process of monopoly; monopoly in oil, in steel and iron, in copper, coal, metals, and in many other things essential to the national life.

Mr. President, these gigantic powers have assumed control by virtue of the proceeds of monopoly of nearly all great industrial, commercial, and transportation companies, and of banks and trust companies, and in large part of the credit system of the United States. It was to provide against this in part that we passed the reserve act, for the purpose of transferring the power over credits to the people of this country through the reserve banks under the authority of the member banks. These powers have controlled the stock markets; they have controlled the organization of every new enterprise of importance, and been able to dictate unfair terms upon every important new industrial undertaking. These swollen fortunes have become a menace to the body of men who are engaged in productive enterprises of all sorts and has led by imitation to the local adoption of monopoly methods to a point which has resulted in unfair prices to the consumer upon all of the necessities of life, except possibly fresh vegetables, and even the latter have not altogether escaped.

Mr. President, I cordially sympathize with the policy of government which encourages business affairs, which encourages men to active initiative in industrial enterprises, which encourages men in thrift, economy, and in expansion. I rejoice when I see the success of business men; I am glad to have them receive an abundant reward for the work they perform, for the enterprises they organize, for their foresight, as well as for their industry and thrift.

I am glad to see them acquire wealth as a reward. I am glad to see them enjoy wealth, build beautiful homes, furnish them luxuriously, have every facility and advantage for living splendidly and beautifully. And the policy of the States and of the United States should be to encourage these, because such men, with their initiative, business ambition, and zeal give employment to other men of smaller abilities. But, Mr. President, the point may arrive where the reward of acquiring property is no longer justified, where the further acquisition of property is a positive vice; where the acquisition of property is against a wise public policy; where the acquisition of property means nothing more and nothing less than the acquisition of power over the industrial, commercial, and financial life of other men—unrestrained by law. The time comes when by an autocratic order of a financial overlord every miner in a whole State can be turned out of employment. The time has already arrived when by a concert of action among the financial giants of the United States, a business depression can be produced, when the value of stocks can be depressed to a most ruinous point at which men of enormous wealth and commanding unlimited cash or cash credits can buy in the property held by weaker business men at one-half, one-third, one-fourth, one-tenth of the actual value, as we saw done in the panic of 1907, when a certain group multiplied their millions by a cold-blooded conspiracy which resulted in the artificial panic of 1907, an investigation of which by Congress they were strong enough to prevent.

I am thankful that I was permitted to assist in bringing about the direct election of Senators by the people, so that the Senate of the United States would not longer be unduly influenced by such self-seeking elements. I am not unmindful, and I am not unappreciative, of the splendid patriotism which many of this group have recently shown.

I deeply appreciate the attitude of Andrew Carnegie, who expressed the opinion that it was little short of a crime for a man to die very rich. Andrew Carnegie has done much to point the way to a wiser and a better method, by distributing his gigantic accumulations as a great steel master as well as through the monopoly of the United States Steel in the way of public benefactions.

Mr. President, the proposed tax, in effect, does not permit the transfer by legacy of any amount in excess of very large sums. It takes 5 per cent of $1,000,000, 6 per cent of the second million, 7 per cent of the third million, 8 per cent of the fourth million, 9 per cent of the fifth million, 10 per cent of the sixth million, 11 per cent of the seventh million, 16 per cent of the twelfth million, 55 per cent of the fiftieth million, 80 per cent of the seventy-fifth million, and a hundred per cent of the ninety-fifth million, and all in excess thereof.

This progressive inheritance tax is justified by public policy. It is one of the means of correcting the abuses of the monopolies which we have heretofore permitted, if not encouraged, in the United States.

THE PLAN PROPOSED IS LAWFUL.

Mr. President, the plan proposed is lawful and has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank (107 U. S., 283), in which the court held that the inheritance-tax law of Illinois makes a classification for taxation which the legislature had power to make, and that the inheritance-tax law does not conflict in any way with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

The court in this case shows that these laws have been in force in many of the States of the United States—Pennsylvania, 1826; Maryland, 1844; Delaware, 1869; West Virginia, 1887; Connecticut, New Jersey, Ohio, Maine, Massachusetts, 1891; Minnesota, by constitutional provision.

The constitutionality of said taxes has been declared and the principles explained in many cases referred to in the case above mentioned. For example, in The United States v. Perkins (163 U. S., 625), Klapp v. Mason (94 U. S., 589), United States v. Fox (94 U. S., 315), Mager v. Grima (8 Howard, 490), and so forth.

Mr. President, there are few thoughtful men, even of the very rich, who would say that they were being ruined by the public when the public laws forbid them to transfer to other human beings amounts in excess of what is permitted by this proposed amendment.

Mr. President, it takes a human being of the first magnitude to administer an estate of $10,000,000 with wisdom and efficiency. No human being can properly consume the income of such an estate, which at 5 per cent will make the income $500,000 per annum, or $1,366 per diem—about $100 an hour for every waking hour. Since such vast sums of money can not be wisely used by the individual in gratification of any just personal needs, and since its possession frequently leads to serious extravagances, to the establishment of false standards of living, to extreme snobbishness in a democracy, and even leads to ruinous dissipation and vice, and sometimes even to the corruption of government, a wise public policy should establish a system of government which will restore to the people so much of the swollen fortunes developed by our modern methods as justice demands.

No thoughtful student will deny that these gigantic fortunes represent values created by the labors and activities of all our people. No man can deny the moral righteousness of restoring to the people by legacy taxes that which they have created and which has been taken from them under legal processes, by fair legal means, perhaps, under the best view of the case, and by crafty, unfair, and illegal means in the worst view of the case.

Mr. President, the British Empire, the German Empire, France, Italy, and Switzerland have the progressive inheritance tax. This system prevails in the Netherlands, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Greece, Roumania, Bulgaria, Japan, in Spanish America, Uruguay, Chile, Brazil, Argentina, Guatemala, and Mexico; also in Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, West Australia, New Zealand, Queensland, Cape of Good Hope, Cape Colony, and in the principal colonies of Canada—Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, and perhaps others.

A number of our States have established inheritance taxes, as shown by the table as of 1906, which I ask leave to insert in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the proceeds of the estate tax, according to the last tables at my disposal, were comparatively small for the very good reason, Mr. President, that whenever persons having a very large estate desire to escape the inheritance tax they can transfer their political domicile and thereby escape it. The consequence is that men point to the tables of the returns of State inheritance taxes and say the total amount from a national inheritance-tax law will only be $6,000,000. It is my opinion that this item will raise $600,000,000 instead of $6,000,000. The amendment which I have offered takes nothing from the States. It turns over to the State the amount provided by the State law and retains the balance in the Federal Treasury, and does this automatically. In fact, it safeguards the States by preventing a man avoiding for his heirs this tax by changing his political domicile.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I was only going to say, in connection with what the Senator says about raising taxes, that they have very heavy estate taxes in England in different forms—estate duties, legacy taxes, and so forth. They are all collected under one head. They were very heavy when they were imposed, and they have been much increased. They raised in 1917 thirty-one million sterling, $150,000,000, and they raised substantially the same in 1916. Those are heavy inheritance taxes that have been in force for many years, and that shows a pretty good average.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator mean in New England?

Mr. LODGE. No; no; in England. They raise from this source $150,000,000—thirty-one million sterling. I was only speaking about the average of raising estate taxes.

Mr. OWEN. The wealth of the United States is very large, and I believe the tax here would be very much more.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma that the most just and equitable tax is an estate tax. Most of the fortunes which descend to children are a curse to them. I would suggest to the Senator whether it would not be wiser to increase the rate, say, between $500,000 and $10,000,000, so that the State tax would not take the whole thing?

Mr. OWEN. I should be quite willing to accept an amendment of that kind. I only wanted to make it so moderate that no man could oppose it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Take it in Minnesota; my recollection is that all estates over $50,000 would pay 5 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. And I am inclined to think it is progressive beyond that; so that under this proposal, in the case of a moderate estate, no tax would be received by the Federal Government in many States.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I should be willing to accept an amendment of that kind.

The only way in which to make a progressive inheritance tax really effective is to make it national. Large estates can always escape the State tax merely by changing the political domicile. It is easy to do, and has been done over and over again.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator mean that the owner of a large estate, when in the natural order of things he approaches the end of life, can move from the State of his domicile to another State that he may die there?

Mr. OWEN. No; not that he may die there; just establish a political domicile, and that is all there is about it—put a summer house in New Hampshire or put a camp in Idaho.

Mr. STONE. Oh, well, he changes his political allegiance from one State to another.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; but that kind of a man does not render any political allegiance. He never votes.

Mr. STONE. Has the Senator any data as to the number of people who do that?

Mr. OWEN. I have no statistics as to the number. I referred a moment ago to a case which involved a very large estate. I did not wish to stigmatize anybody, of course.

Mr. STONE. Oh, no; I would not ask the Senator now to name individuals. I merely ask him if he has data showing that that sort of thing has been done?

Mr. OWEN. I have heard that in a number of different instances, and I do not doubt that it is a fact. It is a very reasonable thing to occur.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. The States collect an inheritance tax on all property situated within their borders whether the deceased is a resident of the State or not, and that includes personal property actually situated in the State imposing the tax.

For instance, take a citizen of New York and a resident of New York dying in New York: His stock in the Great Northern Railroad or any other railroad corporation existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota pays an inheritance tax in the State of Minnesota and the same in all other States. That has been sustained by the Supreme Court of New York and many other States, and, I believe, by the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, of course, the personal property that follows the person of the deceased would escape taxation by his moving and becoming a resident and dying in a State not imposing the tax.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in my judgment it is of importance to the holders of very large property that the people of the United States should feel that the gross excess of acquisition should at last revert to the people of the United States. It will appease a part of the just resentment against monopoly methods.

On the 29th of June, 1909, I placed in the RECORD tables showing the systems of the world in this matter, which I will not repeat.

In the published volume of West on Inheritance Tax will be found the record of world laws in regard to the inheritance tax. In 1909, when I presented this amendment, the Senate of the United States was not fairly representative of the people of the United States; and in presenting the matter I stated that I did not expect the amendment at that time to receive respectful consideration, but I offered it because I desired the people of the United States to consider it. The temper of the Senate has been greatly changed since then. I believe the Senate now is fairly representative of the public opinion of the United States, and I hope that the Senate will now consider this matter and act upon it, and not from weariness of mind refuse to consider and approve this amendment.

I understand that the reason why the provision of the House bill was struck out by the committee was because it was thought it would interfere with the States and the inheritance tax imposed by the States. I have carefully obviated that objection and provided a means by which the States will receive every dollar of the inheritance tax imposed by the local laws and by which the United States will receive the remainder.

The accumulation of gigantic fortunes in a single hand, with the huge power of increase where the income can not be consumed, is dangerous, in my opinion, to the commercial liberties of the people, and, because dangerous to the commercial and the financial liberties of the people, I think it is dangerous to the political and civil liberties of the people. For that reason these gigantic estates ought to be subjected to a large tax, especially as they increase to very great amounts.

We have established in this country the doctrine that we will not follow the English rule of primogeniture or of entail; and the reason for that is to prevent gigantic estates passing into the hands of the very few, leaving the many without adequate property. We have made that a part of the American system, and yet we are permitting its evasion now through putting great estates in trust, like the Chicago estates, such as the Field estate. In that case there is sixty millions now in the hands of a trustee for little children. That sixty millions will be two thousand millions by the time those children shall pass the river of life. We are permitting a condition that is nullifying our refusal to adopt the principle of primogeniture and of entail, through the policy of permitting corporations that have no death to take over properties and hold them, and permitting these estates to pass in trust by life tenure that is endless. It is against a wise public policy; and when it comes to a choice between a tax on these great estates and taxing the coffee and the tea and the sugar and the cocoa that the people use on their tables, I do not think they ought to be mentioned on the same day.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I intend to discuss the question which is before the Senate of the consumption taxes, as they are called; but I am very much interested in what the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has been saying.

I do not think anybody differs about the evil of these vast fortunes to which he has referred, nor about the rates that he proposes to put on them, nor about the soundness of our laws which prevent primogeniture in the case of an intestate, although certainly they do not prevent it in cases where a will is made, where it can be left to one child. I agree with the Senator about these vast fortunes. As I say, I do not quarrel at all with his rates, nor, let me say also, with regard to the effect on the States. The States now protest violently against our taking their last field of taxation. We have entered all of them. If we do anything, we ought to provide for them as the Senator proposes; and that would not only prevent evasion but it would prevent injustices which now occur where the same estate, instead of being taxed once, as the Senator's amendment provides, is taxed in whole or in part by the State, by the Nation, and by half a dozen other States, perhaps. All those features are excellent. Of course, we must have inheritance taxes. Everybody realizes that. The trouble with inheritance taxes is this, and I wish some method of dealing with it could be found:

The Government takes the money from the inheritance. It spends it. In other words, an inheritance tax destroys capital. The Senator spoke very wisely of the importance of capital in business. Now, there is the difficulty. If we could only devise some method by which that capital should not be spent by the Government and wiped out, but could be kept in the channels of business, by all means let us devise it and get rid of these vast fortunes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, that can be easily accomplished; and the Government in its expenditures now can not be justly said to be altogether destroying capital. When the Government invests millions of dollars annually in the Agricultural Department, which expands the productive powers of the fields of this Nation, it is not only not a destruction of capital but it is an expansion of capital of the most important character. When the Government puts up a $15,000,000 nitrate plant, if it ever does, as the law provides, for the purpose of making powder in times of war and making fertilizer in times of peace, it is not a destruction of capital; it is a multiplication of capital, and is making the capital more productive than it could be in any other way.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I agree with the Senator, if the Government is going to do all the business of the country.

Mr. OWEN. It ought to do some of it.

Mr. LODGE. But I have not yet reached the point of being willing to have the Government embark on State socialism.

Mr. President, I wanted to discuss these taxes on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar.

The bill that came from the House presented to the Senate a raise of duties of 10 per cent on practically every article that now comes in, either free or dutiable. The committee struck from the bill those tariff provisions, and the Senate has concurred in the action of the committee. I think it would be very unfortunate, and present great difficulties, to attempt at this time in this bill to raise all the tariff duties. It would bring up a host of questions which could not be properly dealt with in several months. That is one practical difficulty. As the duties are imposed by the House, they would make all sorts of inequalities and injustices that would have to be met. But the House has presented us with that scheme and it raises $206,000,000. According to the doctrines of one party in this Chamber, all those increases are consumption taxes. According to the doctrines of the same party, they are not only consumption taxes to the extent of the amount of duty imposed, but to a much larger extent by reason of the increase which will be made to the consumer by the retailer.

The view of the other party, of which I am a member, is that protective duties will not cause an increase to the consumer except in cases where the articles are noncompetitive. I am not going to enter into that discussion. I am only trying to show that the House was levying consumption taxes to the amount of $206,000,000. We have stricken them out. Now, when your conferees meet the House conferees they will have nothing to offer as an alternative if the bill remains simply with those stricken out, and I apprehend that the House would not be at all disposed to accept a naked elimination of a section of this bill by which they attempted to raise a great deal of money and which they think is a proper form of taxation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The bill as the House passed it carried about a billion and a half of revenue, as I recall. The bill as it is now shaped up, with the amendments that have been made on the floor of the Senate, carries practically two and a half billion dollars. Does not the Senator believe that with the increased amount of taxation put in the bill by the Finance Committee and on the floor of the Senate we can afford to lose the $200,000,000 included in the provision to which the Senator has just referred?

Mr. LODGE. If I thought the House took the same view of this question as the Senator from Louisiana, I have no doubt they would welcome our striking it out; but from what I know of the conferees, I am inclined to think they do not. In all events, we are confronted with that condition. We have reduced the so-called consumption taxes to four, and we have lowered the amount of revenue from $206,000,000 to $86,000,000, and we have removed them from the class of tariff duties by making them excise taxes. The House put a tariff of 10 per cent on tea, coffee, sugar, and cocoa—on everything, in fact, but including those items. The House tariff rate would raise about $12,000,000 on coffee. Our rate would raise $20,000,000. That is 2 cents a pound. If it were equally distributed it would be, in round numbers, a tax of about 20 cents per capita on the people of this country.

From tea we expect to raise $5,000,000, with an excise tax of 5 cents a pound; on cocoa, $7,000,000, with an excise tax of 3 cents a pound; and on sugar, $54,000,000, with an excise tax of one-half a cent a pound. The rate is very low; the amount to be paid per capita is trifling; the taxes are easy of collection and certain in the revenue. It all goes to the Government and it is evenly distributed. It is the greatest possible mistake to say that it falls on the poor man. Those taxes fall on everybody who consumes those articles, and the well-to-do and the rich households consume more, far more, and pay a larger proportion of them.

Of the sugar consumption 35 per cent goes into candies. We have heard something about taxing luxuries. It seems to me there is no reason why candies should not be taxed, especially, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] suggests, those that are sold at from 80 cents to a dollar a pound. Coffee, tea, and cocoa are not raised in this country. They are non-competitive articles.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] made a point about Porto Rico which I think is correct, and which I think an amendment ought to remedy; but I can not agree with him in what he says about Brazil. It is all true. The attitude of Brazil to this country has been most friendly. They have behaved admirably. We wish to encourage it in every possible way. The trouble with that argument is that it goes too far. If we are to refuse to put a burden of duty or taxes upon articles produced by the nations with which we are associated in carrying on this war we shall find a terrible gap in our revenues. Take the case of the principal exports from France, with which we are as closely associated as one nation can be with another—France, which has borne the brunt, more almost than any other nation, of this terrible war, on whose soil it is being fought. We put the heaviest kind of duties on one great French export of silks. On the argument about Brazil we ought to take off those duties. In this very bill we add to the duties on French wine, which is another of her great exports. On the argument about Brazil we should not increase the duties on French wine.

Mr. President, that is an impossible attitude to take. France reduces no duties on our products, nor England either. We do not expect them to, and we should not take it as unfriendly if they were to increase their duties, or if Brazil, in order to raise money, were to increase her duties on some of our exports. No nation can afford to cut off the duty of revenue raising because the country from which it imports is a friendly country with which it is closely allied. If we did this to Brazil on this account we should discriminate in favor of Brazil against every other country with which we are now associated. The coffee tax, the tea and cocoa tax, and the sugar tax all rest on the same ground. I think it is proper that a certain amount of this revenue should be raised by general taxes of this character.

We have had England used here as an example a good deal. We have been urged to put an 80 per cent tax on war profits because England did it. We have had England's taxes marched up and down in the Senate Chamber for days. I want to call the attention of the Senate now to the manner in which England is taxing these very articles to-day.

England puts a duty on cocoa of 13.8 cents per pound. Crude cocoa comes into this country free. She puts on coffee, as a duty to come into the country, 9.4 cents. On sugar we have put a duty, in round numbers, of 1 cent a pound. She puts on sugar a duty of 2.8 cents, and on refined sugar a duty of 3.1 cents. On tea she puts a duty of 24 cents a pound, and on glucose 2 cents, where we put a quarter of a cent.

Mr. BROUSSARD rose.

Mr. LODGE. Those are the duties. Now, wait a minute; I am coming now to the excises which she has levied since the war began in order to raise money for the war.

On sugar, in addition to the 2.8 cents of duty, England has put an excise of 2.7 cents a pound, and we propose here a half cent. She has put on coffee substitutes an excise of 3 cents a pound in addition to the 9.4 cents of duty, and we put 2. On glucose she puts an excise of 2 cents, where we put a quarter of a cent. On saccharine we have now a duty of 65 cents. England has a duty of $13.12 per pound, and she has doubled it with the excise, or a total of $26.24 which she puts on saccharine, against our $2.50. The excise taxes alone that she has added go far beyond ours, and when you couple them with the duties you see what great sums she raises.

I have here the French rates. It has not been possible to get the German war rates, but they all tax these things.

The duty on sugar imported into France, owing to her beet product, has been practically prohibitive. These are her war taxes on these articles:

On green coffee she puts a tax of 2½ cents per pound.

On coffee, roasted or ground, 3.6 cents, as against our 2.

On tea, 3.6 cents as against our 5. That is lower.

On cocoa beans and shells, 1.8 cents a pound.

On crushed cocoa and cocoa butter, 2.3 cents.

On chocolate, 2.4 cents.

On sugar, 3.6 cents per pound, and we are proposing to put a quarter of a cent. These are excise war taxes.

On raw sugar for refining, the same.

On glucose, nine-tenths of a cent.

On saccharine—not important—$18 a pound.

Mr. President, the English taxes are far heavier than ours. The French taxes, as a rule, are heavier than those we propose. There is not a civilized country in the world that does not tax these articles. There has come to the Senate committee—I have asked the other members—not one single word of protest from any consumer of these articles. The tax is so small that it would not be felt by anybody. A large part of it would be absorbed by the dealers, importers, and retailers. There is an enormous margin of profit in coffee now. It comes in at about 7½ cents a pound, and I think it is sold in packages for 25 cents per pound. We put a tax on tea during the Spanish-American War. There was not any change in the prices of tea, except that the import was confined to rather superior qualities as compared with those that came in before.

Now, the sugar industries of Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Louisiana under the conditions of the war have been making great profits; in the case of the beet-sugar industries they have been making enormous profits; and it would be no undue burden on them.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is only just, as I have said before, in a democracy that everybody should pay something toward the support of the Government. Here are taxes which take 20 or 50 cents per capita in the United States, the incidents of which would not be felt, and they raise the large sum of $86,000,000. Because we have raised the war-profits tax we can not afford to throw away other just and reasonable taxes. I think what the Senate committee has done is far more reasonable, far better economically than the system proposed by the House. You must remember it is between those two systems that it will be necessary to choose.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LODGE. I am through.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know whether the Senator stated it, but to illustrate in one instance how infinitesimally small these taxes will be, there are from 150 to 200 cups in 1 pound of tea. One hundred and fifty to 200 cups of tea can be made from 1 pound, and the duty on 1 pound is 2 cents.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about the proposed excise tax on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar. I shall detain the Senate only a few minutes.

It seems to me that the principle on which this bill is framed is to exact a rather large burden of taxation from those who are able to pay from war profits on business that is making a great deal more money since the war began than it made before, and from incomes over and above what is necessary to support a man's family. The bill is going to produce in the neighborhood of $2,500,000,000, and nearly all of that great sum will come from income taxes and war profits. This amount is not to be produced by tariff taxes, although the House invaded the realm of the tariff and proposed to raise about $206,000,000 on these four articles—tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar. It is not proposed in the bill to raise any material part of it in any other way than by taxing wealth in various forms.

For that reason, sir, I am unable to understand why the committee found it necessary to single out four of the essential articles of human food and impose the small tax of $86,000,000 upon these articles in a bill that is to raise $2,500,000,000. Eighty-six million dollars, Mr. President, is only about 3½ per cent of two and a half billions. That is a very small part of the revenue we are getting in this bill.

Why did the gentlemen of the Finance Committee find it necessary, I repeat, to go to the breakfast table and pick out four articles of food? Are the necessities of our Government so great that we are required to do that?

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says that England is taxing tea, coffee, sugar, and cocoa, and that France is taxing these same commodities. The situation, sir, is very different in those countries. They have been bearing the brunt of the greatest war the world has ever known for more than three years, and it is probably necessary for them to tax everything which can possibly stand a tax. Thank God, we are not in that situation. We have been in the war only a very short while. Perhaps the day will come when we also will be obliged to tax not only tea, coffee, sugar, and cocoa, but flour and meat and all articles of human food. I sincerely hope that time will never come, but it may, and when it does come I for one, sir, shall not complain if taxes are proposed on all articles of food; but I do complain most seriously at this time.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that this tax is so small it amounts to practically nothing. Mr. President, it is a little more serious than the Senator admits. The tax on sugar amounts to 40 cents per capita for every man and woman and child in the United States. We consume about 80 pounds of sugar per capita per annum. A tax of half a cent is 40 cents.

Mr. LODGE. In fact, I went 10 cents higher than the Senator did.

Mr. RANDELL. I was speaking only in general terms. The Senator indicated that the tax was very light, that it would not burden anyone, and I was simply going into details, to show that it will burden poor people a great deal.

Mr. LODGE. I said it would be about 50 cents per capita on sugar and 20 cents on coffee.

Mr. RANDELL. I think the Senator got it a little wrong on the consumption of sugar. To be exact, it is 78 pounds per capita per annum. We are raising in this bill some $54,000,000 from sugar. We estimate that we are going to handle in this country next year 10,800,000,000 pounds of sugar, but a portion of that is to be sent abroad. We will consume in this country a good deal less than that. The consumption is only about 78 pounds per capita, and the tax, to be entirely fair—and I wish to be fair in this argument—is only about 40 cents per capita on sugar.

Mr. LODGE. I do not disagree with the Senator about that. I made that argument when I was arguing for a protective duty.

Mr. RANDELL. I understood the Senator, and I wish to be entirely fair in my argument. Taking my figures, they are less. If I took the Senator's, my case would be much stronger. From my viewpoint the tax on sugar, then, is 40 cents per capita, on coffee it is 20 cents, on tea 5 cents, on cocoa 7 cents, or a total per capita on these four articles of 72 cents. Now, 72 cents a year does not sound very big to Members of the United States Senate, but, sir, I contend it is a pretty serious proposition to the ordinary laboring family of five souls, dependent for what they eat on the labor of the wage earner. It means $3.60 per annum added to the food supply of the average family of five of the ordinary wage earner and is a very important matter to him.

Let us bear in mind that the average citizen is a poor man; he is a wage earner; he does not have to pay income taxes or excess-profits taxes as contemplated in the bill. The average citizen is not expected to contribute one dollar to the $2,500,000,000 we are to raise by the bill.

I repeat, this bill is designed to raise this vast sum from successful business, from people who have considerable income, and from excess profits on business. It does not contemplate going into the families of the poor and making each family contribute $3.60 per annum, but that is what it does.

Mr. President, another phase of the bill that I wish to call attention to is that section 8, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States provides that all taxes shall be uniform. Is there any uniformity in this kind of taxation, which singles out four commodities of human food and allows all other commodities to go untaxed? Where is the fairness or the uniformity in that proposition? If we are to tax these four articles, why not tax meat and flour, fish and game, and lentils, cereals, fruit, and vegetables? Why not tax every article of human food, if you are to tax any?

Do we make any distinction in our tax on incomes? We adopt a basis and everyone who has an income above that basis pays a tax. Why make a distinction in regard to the food we consume? There is no just or valid reason for it, Mr. President, and the time has certainly not yet arrived for singling out these particular articles and punishing them.

Mr. President, there is one feature of the bill that appeals to me very strongly as one of the Senators from Louisiana. Sugar is a very important agricultural product of my State. We produce about 300,000 tons of sugar in Louisiana. The bill proposes to tax that sugar about $3,000,000 per annum. It proposes to impose a tax of $13.50 upon every acre of sugar cane in the State of Louisiana. I do not think, sir, that is fair.

It is true that the other three commodities—coffee, cocoa, and tea—are not raised in continental United States, although coffee to a very considerable extent is produced in the island of Porto Rico, as my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] has so ably pointed out. But, sir, I find it incomprehensible that one agricultural product of the United States, one single product of farms of this country, to wit, sugar, is singled out in this bill for taxation when every other product of agriculture in the Union is allowed to remain free from taxation.

Is there anything fair in that? Is that the uniformity which the Constitution speaks of? Is that the equality we have a right to expect in all taxation? Equality and uniformity throughout the taxing area is the principle upon which all taxes should be imposed.

I wish some one would explain to me why this great product of my State should be singled out in this bill and have this great tax imposed upon it when we have just been legislating to fix a good, fair price upon wheat. If sugar is to be taxed, why not tax wheat? If sugar is to be taxed, why not tax corn? If sugar is to be taxed, why not tax meat in all its forms? There is absolutely, sir, no reason for taxing one and exempting the other.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be delighted to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think perhaps the Senator ought to take into consideration that the price of sugar has already been fixed by Mr. Hoover, as I understand, and, if I am correctly informed, the sugar interests of the United States have agreed to that price, namely, 7½ cents at New York. If that is the case, I will say to the Senator, it will make no difference, as far as the producer of sugar is concerned, whether this consumption tax goes on or whether it stays off.

I know the Senator realizes that the West is just as deeply interested in this subject as Louisiana. As far as the western growers are concerned, they are not objecting to this consumption tax. I will admit that I personally would oppose any consumption tax on sugar or anything else if it were not for the war; but I take into consideration the amount of consumption tax that is imposed by all the other countries involved in the war, and the further fact that the price of sugar has been fixed at which it shall be sold, at least, to the wholesaler. Then, I do not believe the sugar industry is going to be affected by this tax.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator if the price of flour has not also been fixed?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the price of flour has not yet been fixed.

Mr. RANSDELL. The papers state so anyway, just as much so as the price of sugar has been fixed.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me ask the Senator if the price of sugar has been fixed now at 7½ cents a pound, or whatever it is, and then if Congress imposes this excise tax upon that sugar, will it not necessarily follow that the consumer will have to pay the tax, because that price has been fixed before the tax is laid?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question but that the consumer will have to pay the one-half cent placed here on sugar. There is a question as to whether he will pay it on coffee or tea; but as far as sugar is concerned there is no doubt he will have to pay it.

Mr. RANSDELL. It will be added to the 7½ cents?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The price, then, will be 7½ cents under the Senator's theory.

Mr. SMOOT. Seven and one-fourth cents with the tax added.

Mr. RANSDELL. Do I understand that the Senator, as a representative of a State which produces a very large quantity of sugar, is entirely satisfied to have that great product of his State singled out as the one solitary article of American agriculture for taxation when no other article of the American farm is subject to tax?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says "entirely satisfied." I will have to qualify that. I am satisfied that under the conditions the Government should impose this tax, because every civilized country in the world is imposing the tax, particularly during the present war.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will my colleague yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to suggest that if other countries impose the tax at this time they imposed it in peace times, and it is the policy of their Government. It has not been the policy of this Government to impose that kind of a tax during peace times, and that they have increased the tax now in those countries does not change the situation, because we may have to do that ourselves.

The time may come when we shall have to tax flour; the time may come when we shall have to tax meat; we hope not; but this is not the time. The taxes to which the Senator refers are taxes imposed in peace times, as a governmental policy, through which revenues are derived by the various Governments to carry on the affairs of government under ordinary conditions. All these Governments have done is, after having increased the tariff duties, as England has done with reference to sugar, raising the tariff from half a cent to 2.8, they have then found it necessary to impose an additional excise tax to that which already existed. That is true of England. So it is true of France and of Italy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, England in peace times never had a higher tax upon sugar than about 39.4 cents a hundred. That tax was imposed just as we have always imposed a tax upon sugar. This is a consumption tax which has been put on for war purposes, and for war purposes only. The Senator knows that I would not agree to single out sugar and put a consumption tax on it in peace times and not apply that same tax to other products of the soil.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then why does the Senator do it now? If we need a tax on sugar for war now, why do we not need a tax on beef now or a tax on flour now? Why does the Senator stop at sugar? That is what I can not understand.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires an answer, I will tell him why.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be very glad to have the answer.

Mr. SMOOT. In the first place, a tax can be imposed upon no product of the soil which can be so easily collected as the tax upon sugar. All countries recognize that and all countries impose such a tax. A few countries also impose a tax upon wheat and upon flour. I do not want to take any more of the time of the Senator while he is delivering his speech, but I am going to refer to this matter, if I speak upon this question, and I shall show the difference, and the thought of the statesmen of other countries along that line, and cite the reasons which they have given for the imposition of a tax upon sugar and not upon flour and upon wheat. There is a difference, I will say to the Senator; but it would take too long for me to go into that discussion in his speech.

Mr. RANSDELL. We could certainly collect a tax on wheat as easily as a tax on sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so.

Mr. RANSDELL. There are a number of big mills where most of the wheat is ground into flour; there are only a few small mills; and each mill that grinds flour could be required, under a penalty, to pay the tax before the flour leaves the mill. It would be just as feasible to do that as to collect a tax on sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. The farmer who raises wheat could take it and feed it to his stock when it was lower priced than it is to-day, and he did so. There is, however, but one place where the farmer who raises beets may take them, and that is to the beet factory; there is only one place where sugar imported into this country can be refined, and that is at the refineries; and there are so few of them that there is not any question that no part of the product could escape taxation, and the taxes can be collected at very little cost to the Government.

Of course, there are other reasons for the imposition of this tax on sugar, I will say to the Senator, but I will simply mention that one.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, that is the most remarkable argument I ever heard; that the farmer would feed $2.20 wheat to his cattle. I never heard of any such proposition as that and neither did the Senator from Utah or any other reasonable man arguing before a sensible body of men; and the Senate certainly is a sensible body—that it is easier to collect the tax on sugar than it is on flour, because the farmer could feed wheat to his hogs and to his cattle. Everybody knows, sir, that wheat is not eaten in the raw state; it is ground in somebody's mill; and the vast percentage of the wheat of this country is ground in large mills, not in local mills.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know the Senator does not want to do me an injustice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield. I do not want to do a wrong to anyone.

Mr. SMOOT. My suggestion was not that the farmers were going to feed $2.20 wheat to their stock—

Mr. RANDELL. But that is the price of wheat to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. But I specifically stated the farmer did that not at the price of the wheat to-day, but when it was selling at a lower price.

Mr. RANDELL. But we are dealing with sugar to-day; we are not dealing with sugar in the past years when it was selling at a lower price or with wheat when it was selling at a lower price. We are dealing with them now under war conditions. It is the present with which we must deal. I say it is just as feasible to collect a tax on wheat as it is to collect a tax on sugar. It is absolutely no argument to say you can collect a tax on sugar more easily.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah is willing to have his people taxed unfairly, that is no reason why I, as a Representative of Louisiana, should be willing for my people to be taxed unfairly; and I am not willing that they shall be. I insist that if you are going to tax one product of the farmer you should tax them all alike, and in that event I would not say a word.

I am a cotton grower by business, and one of the very best articles of human food is cotton seed, which is taken from the cotton. I insist if you are going to tax sugar that you shall put a tax on cotton seed. I raise cattle and hogs, and if you are going to tax sugar put a tax on the cattle and the hogs that I raise. I do not want to be singled out and protected when my neighbors in the other portions of my State are treated in this unfair manner, because my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] has just shown to you that this tax is to be paid by the producer of the article. Contracts are already being made requiring the producer when he sells the tonnage to pay the tax. Perhaps it will be passed ultimately to the consumer; I hope it will if it is to be imposed; but it is going to be paid, in the first instance, by the farmer, who digs it out of the ground by the sweat of his brow. Again I say, if the Senator from Utah is so altruistic as to wish his people to contribute an unfair percentage of the taxes that are being raised in order to carry on this great war, I am not a member of the same altruistic class.

I did not intend to speak so long, Mr. President, and I really have no more to say. I simply want to add that these four articles, and especially two of them—sugar and coffee—are necessary adjuncts to every man's daily food supply. There are a great many people in the world who can not live without coffee; it is as necessary to them as bread and meat. Why tax those people when it is not necessary to do so? Why impose this great burden of $3.60 upon every family of five every year when it is not necessary? Mr. President, I hope the Senate is not going to insist upon these unfair excise taxes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, is there any question pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, so many Senators have left the Chamber that I do not feel it would be quite fair to ask for a vote upon any of these consumption taxes to-night. I know that Senators feel very strongly on both sides about these taxes and will want to be present when the vote is taken, and I think to have the vote this afternoon, with a thin Senate such as we have, would hardly be fair. I shall, therefore, not ask for a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to the committee amendment this afternoon.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he would have any objection to my submitting to the committee amendment an amendment which I have in relation to cocoa and which he has approved?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection whatever to that.

Mr. WEEKS. Then, Mr. President, I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the pending motion will be laid aside. Is that the desire of the Senator from North Carolina, and to proceed with other amendments?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has some matters which he desires to bring up, and I ask that this particular amendment which we have been considering be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection—

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President—

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think I have the floor, and I have offered an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. Until something is done with that amendment no other amendment can be considered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was going to say that the Senator from Massachusetts claimed the right to the floor to have his amendment stated; but the Chair was asking if there was objection to now laying aside the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to be hereafter taken up.

Mr. BROUSSARD. To be hereafter taken up without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let the amendment to the amendment be read, Mr. President. I do not know what it is.

The SECRETARY. On page 86 it is proposed to strike out from line 4 to line 9, inclusive, and to insert the following:

Upon all crude, prepared, or manufactured cocoa and chocolate produced or imported and sold or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 3 cents per pound, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment has never been submitted to the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the amendment again stated, at least, so that I may follow it.

Mr. WEEKS. It changes the tax imposed in this bill from 5 to 3 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the manufactured cocoa will be taxed at the same rate as the crude cocoa?

Mr. WEEKS. That is true; but there is no other form than semicrude chocolate coming into this country under present conditions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment read again. I think very few Senators understood it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this commodity does not come to this country in the form of beans which are subsequently manufactured into cocoa?

Mr. WEEKS. The only form in which cocoa comes into this country now is in the form of semicrude chocolate. The price is so high in the foreign countries where the cocoa is produced that very little is coming into the United States. In the first three months of this year about 300,000 pounds were imported as against about 600,000 pounds in the first three months of last year. I think the tax should be entirely stricken out; but if this additional tax is imposed it will prevent any chocolate in the semicrude form coming into the United States, and it will destroy an industry which has been a consistent revenue producer.

Mr. FLETCHER. I supposed that the large amount of the cocoa we get is in the form of the bean, which is manufactured after it is shipped into this country.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true, but that has nothing to do with the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, line 4, after the word "shows," it is proposed to insert the words "and outdoor general amusement parks, main gates, shows, and rides therein."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that the amendment is to an amendment reported by the committee which has already been adopted. It will be necessary, therefore, to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted before the amendment can be offered.

Mr. STONE. Then I ask that the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which has been stated, to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that amendment being agreed to, it is important to make some changes in other parts of the bill. I send to the desk several amendments prepared by one of the experts of the Treasury, the purpose of the amendments being merely to have the other parts of the bill conform to the amendment which has just been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. STONE. There are several amendments. Whether they should be separately stated or not I will leave to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, line 8, it is proposed to strike out lines 7 to 12, in the House text, reading as follows:

And (b) a tax of 5 cents for each admission of each person (except in the case of a bona fide employee and children under 12 years of age and municipal officers on official business) admitted free to any place for admission to which a charge is made, to be paid by the person so admitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(c)" in the committee amendment and insert "(b)."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the amendment now offered is to a committee amendment which has been agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move that the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I now move the amendment which the Secretary is about to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 57, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(c)" and to insert "(b)"; on page 57, line 22, to strike out the letter "(d)" and insert "(c)"; on page 58, line 10, to strike out the letter "(e)" and insert "(d)."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the letter "a" and the parentheses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 3, it is proposed to strike out all after the comma, through the comma in line 6, or, in other words, to strike out the words:

Or (b) admitting any person free to any place for admission to which a charge is made shall collect the amount of the tax imposed by section 700 from the person so admitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out first the letter "c" in parentheses, and the words "in either case."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 11—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in the committee amendment. The Senator from Missouri will have to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. STONE. I move to reconsider the vote wherever it is necessary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment on page 60, from lines 10 to 19, both inclusive, was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed now to strike out, on page 60, line 11, the letter "(d)," the word "or," and the letter "(e)," and insert "(c)" and "(d)."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have handed to the Secretary a number of pro forma amendments that it is necessary to adopt. They relate to phraseology, punctuation, change of dates, and matters of such character. I think we might just as well get through with these amendments this afternoon, as there is nothing else before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first of the proposed amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 4, of the Gerry amendment, so-called, heretofore adopted, after the words "per centum," it is proposed to insert the words "per annum," so that it will read "forty-five per centum per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the last word, the word "the," and all of lines 23 and 24 and insert the words "together with the tax to be collected by assessment or on any bond given."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 23—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now under consideration requires the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment on page 34 was adopted, known as section 310. Is there objection to reconsidering that vote? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, what is the amendment?

The SECRETARY. In line 23, page 34, it is proposed to strike out the word "hereafter," where it reads "which are hereafter produced in the United States."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there should be an amendment before that in the same section, in line 15. Before the word "produced" the word "hereafter" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator had better propose that amendment a little later. The question is on the amendment now proposed to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I want the Secretary to state the amendment that has just been agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 23, before the word "produced," strike out the word "hereafter."

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct. Now, I move to insert the word "hereafter" before the word "removed," in line 26.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 26, before the word "removed," it is proposed to insert the word "hereafter."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, on the same page, in line 15, I move to strike out the word "hereafter" before the word "produced" and insert the word "hereafter" after the word "and" or before the word "removed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 15, before the word "produced," it is proposed to strike out the word "hereafter," and near the end of the line, before the word "removed," to insert the word "hereafter."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 11, it is proposed to strike out the word "hereafter" before the word "produced."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 12, before the word "removed," it is proposed to insert the word "hereafter."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 17, after the word "amended," it is proposed to insert the words "by this act"; on page 4, line 20, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 5, line 8, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 21, line 2, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 21, line 14, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 21, line 19, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 21, line 21, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 21, line 25, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; on page 22, line 12, after the word "amended," insert "by this act"; and on page 22, line 22, after the word "amended," insert "by this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the proposed amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 11, it is proposed to strike out the figures "403," numbering the section, and insert "402."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 20, at the end of the line, it is proposed to insert the word "after," so that it will read "on the day after."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 22, it is proposed to strike out all beginning with the word "and," through the comma in line 1, of page 43.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the numerals "404," numbering the section, and to insert "403."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 21, at the beginning of the line, it is proposed to insert the word "November" in the blank. The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 44, line 11, it is proposed to strike out the word "paying" and insert the word "collecting," so that it will read:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the carrier collecting such tax, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, line 26, it is proposed to fill in the blank by inserting the word "November."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 22, it is proposed to fill in the blank by inserting the word "November."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 11, it is proposed to make the same amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 98, line 11, before the word "first," it is proposed to insert the word "January."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that section has been disagreed to, and it is entirely out of the bill now.

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment can be withdrawn, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The SECRETARY. On page 104, line 16—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion is necessary to reconsider the amendment heretofore adopted at this point.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment on page 104 was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 104, in the committee amendment, on line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$3,000, or, if married, $4,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 117 it is proposed to strike out lines 22 to 24, inclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment of the committee on page 117 was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Now, on page 117, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out lines 22 to 24, inclusive, which read:

(2) Subdivision (f) of section 13 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. And in lieu thereof it is proposed to insert:

(2) Subdivision (f) of section 13 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(f) Likewise, all the provisions of this title relating to the tax authorized and required to be deducted and withheld and paid to the officer of the United States Government authorized to receive the same from the income of nonresident alien individuals from sources within the United States shall be made applicable to income derived from dividends upon the capital stock or from net earnings of domestic or other resident corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies, by nonresident alien companies, corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies not engaged in business or trade within the United States and not having any office or place of business therein, so far as such income is taxable under this title."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 122, line 7—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the committee amendment at this point was heretofore adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 122, at the end of line 7 of the committee amendment, after the word "taxpayer" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a comma and the following words: "and, in the case of a member of a partnership, with his proportionate share of such war-profits tax imposed upon the partnership."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Secretary has finished those amendments I ask that the action of the Senate in adopting the proviso on page 100, beginning at line 15 and extending through line 2, on page 101, be reconsidered, and then I shall offer a new provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move to strike out all down to and including line 2, on page 101, and insert the matter which I send to the desk. I wish to say to the Senate that it is the same except that it has been suggested, and plausibly so, that possibly the language as used originally might subject to taxation incomes earned before March 1, 1913. The substitute is for the purpose of making it certain that that is not the purpose, nor will it be the effect, of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 100, strike out the colon at the end of line 14, and lines 15 to 24, inclusive, and on page 101, lines 1 and 2, insert a period and the following:

Any dividends paid to the shareholders of a corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, in the year 1917, or subsequent tax years, from earnings made prior to January 1, 1913, shall be deemed to have been made from the most recently accumulated undivided profits or surplus, and shall constitute a part of the annual income of the shareholder for the respective years in which earned by the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, and shall be taxed to the shareholder at the rate prescribed by law for such years.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish the Senator from North Carolina would explain just what that means.

Mr. SIMMONS. The original provision provided that a distribution made of earnings in any one year should pay the tax that was imposed during the year in which it was earned. As we drafted it originally, it was held by many to be subject to the construction that that would include incomes earned before 1913, which would be before the time the income-tax act was passed. We have changed it simply to make it clear that the purpose is not to include incomes earned prior to March, 1913.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator as to an income earned in the year 1914 and distributed in March of this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would pay the tax as it was in 1914.

Mr. WEEKS. And if distributed in 1914?

Mr. SIMMONS. If it had been distributed in 1914, it would pay the tax that was imposed during the year in which it was earned; if 1917, it pays the tax of 1917; if 1915, the tax of 1915; if 1914, the tax of 1914. If earned before 1913, it pays no tax at all, because there was no income-tax law.

Mr. WEEKS. Suppose that it should be shown that it was earned in 1914 and distributed this year, would it pay on this year's tax or on that of 1914?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of 1914.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am unable to understand the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. If there is any trouble about it, I will withdraw the amendment for the present and we will take it up later. I do not desire to enter into any discussion of it now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to what I think must be an oversight, or else I am unable to understand it. I am not opposed to the principle which the chairman of the committee has just announced, but it seems to me that the amendment, as prepared, would be inoperative after the 1st of January, 1918, and it is that which I wish to call to the attention of the chairman of the committee. It says:

Any dividends paid to the shareholders of a corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, in the year 1917 or subsequent tax years, from earnings made prior to January 1, 1918, shall be deemed to have been made from the most recently accumulated undivided profits or surplus—

And so forth.

Query: Dividends declared after January 1, 1918, whether they shall be so considered. It seems to me that the amendment as prepared would absolutely make the whole scheme inoperative after January 1, 1918. In other words, after that date these concerns may declare dividends out of the surplus earned prior to March 1, 1913, notwithstanding the fact that there is current income out of which such dividends might have been paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that this question was discussed in the committee this morning, and we were all trying to adjust the matter so as to remove any doubt. If we have not succeeded, I will be very glad to have the Senator suggest any amendment that he wants to make to it. For that reason, if the Senator prefers, I will withdraw the amendment now so that it may have further consideration by the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe it is worthy of further consideration. It may be that I am in error as to this point, but the chairman of the committee, of course, recognizes that if the point is well taken it does not accomplish what the committee intended to accomplish.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the point of the Senator is well taken, perhaps it would not; but I will state that we worked very industriously upon this section. We thought we had perfected it. It was then said that we had not; it was a little ambiguous and we ought to clarify it. We attempted to clarify it. We had it before the committee and thought we had clarified it, but if the Senator, who is a very able member of the committee, thinks we have not succeeded, I am perfectly willing that the matter may go over for further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the matter pending will go over for further consideration.

Mr. NELSON. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee the advisability of having a reprint of the bill with all the amendments that have been adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that would be very good.

Mr. NELSON. I wish the Senator would ask for a reprint of the bill so that we may have it before us on Monday with all the amendments that have been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMMONS. In view of the fact that we have made a very great number of amendments, and the bill is to be voted on finally on Monday, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota is a very opportune one. I thank him very much for bringing it to my attention.

I ask, Mr. President, that there be a reprint of the bill, with all the amendments adopted up to the present time, so that we may know exactly what amendments have been agreed to before we have a final vote upon Monday.

Mr. PENROSE. And of course the date will be printed on the bill, I assume, so that we will know it is the last print.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; with the date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires that it be printed in the usual way, indicating the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole? That is the usual order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina that a reprint of the bill be made with the amendments that have been adopted? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn September 8 (legislative day of August 15), 1917.

Brig. Gen. Lloyd England, the Adjutant General of Arkansas, to be brigadier general in the National Army.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 8, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth! who hast set Thy glory above the heavens.

*Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength. * * **

We bless Thee for all the great and heroic men whom Thou hast raised up in every age of the world's history and ordained them with strength to be leaders among men. Especially do we thank Thee for the great souls who have breathed their spirits into the institutions of our Government and made it a beacon light to guide all lovers of liberty. May it be ours to emulate their virtues that we may seize upon every opportunity as individuals and as a people to widen the sphere of our activities, that peace may once more smile upon us and all the world under the spiritual leadership of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PURCHASE AND MANUFACTURE OF ORDNANCE AND AMMUNITION.

Mr. POULSEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report (No. 141) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 134.

Whereas current rumors are afloat to the effect that a substantial portion of the small-arms ammunition shipped to the American expeditionary forces in France is worthless; and
Whereas it is necessary that these rumors should be fully investigated:
Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of nine Members, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into the manufacture and purchase of ordnance and ammunition, including small-arms ammunition and heavy artillery for use by the armed forces of the United States in the present emergency, and for such purpose it shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths and shall have the right to report at any time.

Mr. POULSEN. Mr. Speaker, there is a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for House Resolution 134.

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of nine Members, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into the manufacture and purchase of ordnance and ammunition, including small-arms and heavy-artillery ammunition already purchased, and the quality and condition thereof, for use by the armed forces of the United States in the present emergency, and for such purposes it shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time.

Mr. POULSEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the resolution and substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina demands the previous question on the resolution and substitute.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution as amended by the substitute.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me just about two minutes? I would like to say something.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to that, for the previous question is in operation and we are already proceeding to a vote.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. There are 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. MADDEN. The question has already been stated on the substitute before the House.

Mr. KAHN. Not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. I appeal to the Speaker to find out whether I am right or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is exactly right. The Speaker hurried it up as much as possible to get rid of it. If the gentleman insists on his point of order, it is well taken. The question is on the resolution as modified by the substitute.

The question was taken, and the resolution as modified was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, when first this matter was before the House the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], for whom I have a very high regard and whom I esteem very highly, took occasion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with this matter in a manner that, in my judgment, reflected on—

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I have only two minutes, and I want to say—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I have only two minutes, and I can not yield.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not seem to me the gentleman ought to make a statement about the gentleman from Wisconsin in his absence; that is all.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from California may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

Mr. KAHN. I did not intend to reflect on the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. If my colleague [Mr. COOPER] were here I would have no objection to the gentleman taking an hour, but in the absence of my colleague I object to any further extension of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say I have been associated with my colleagues on that committee for many years. They are as honorable and as representative a class of men as are found in this House, and I do not believe that a single member of that committee if placed upon this committee on investigation would violate his oath as a Member of this House and would attempt to whitewash any official if he found the facts warranted another conclusion. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts raises the point of order that there is no quorum here. The Chair will count.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point of order, and the gentleman from Illinois asks to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in that one minute I want to say I do not think it is necessary for any Member of the House to rise in his place and defend members of any committee of the House in advance of action that may be taken on any subject that comes before the committee, and I do not believe that any Member of this House gains anything by appealing in advance for the integrity of members of committees against whom no reflection has been made. I do not believe that the fact that a man happens to be on a particular committee and is in close relation with the subject matters that come before a given department justifies the statement that that man is not honest or that he is not fair and that he will not treat the subject with proper consideration, and I think it is bad for the committee itself to have any member of the committee get up in his place and defend it in advance of any charge being made against it.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2469. An act to authorize the change of name of the steamship Caldera to A. T. Kinney; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. J. Res. 43. Making available the $200,000 appropriation for irrigation purposes on the Yakima Indian Reservation, State of Washington, carried in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, just to make peace, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, and, pending that, I want to ask unanimous consent to close general debate when we adjourn this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, and, pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate shall close when the House adjourns this evening.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I have requests for time that will extend over four hours. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that consideration under the five-minute rule will be expedited by allowing liberal time for general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am inclined to be liberal. But yesterday it was suggested over there that they wanted to extend debate. We have consumed more time than the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch], but we are willing to make it even.

Mr. ESCH. Let us defer action on determining when general debate shall be closed until later in the afternoon.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing to do that, and therefore I withdraw the request. We can arrange that some time later.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 5723.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I desire to renew my point of order, but I will wait until the question is put.

The SPEAKER. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 5723.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5723, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch] is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say briefly that I favor, and have favored, as a Member of the three last Congresses, all bills that have been brought in here to pension those who have fought in the wars of our country. But I must say that it seems to me that, when I read these hearings, that there has been a studied effort on the part of some one, some ambitious person in one of the departments of this Government, to reach in and take from the War Department and the Navy Department and from the Interior Department, that have had jurisdiction of these matters, things that have been administered under those departments. But I have no time to pursue that further. I may do so later in this debate.

If it is not true that there has been a studied effort, why has not some one who has been heretofore interested in pension legislation been called before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce? Why was no report demanded from the War Department and from the Interior Department as has been heretofore done for the past 100 years? Why was not the Commissioner of Pensions brought before that committee? But, as I say, I have no time to pursue that further.

While we will all vote for any pension bill, of course, that has any redeeming features in it, that will benefit any portion of the soldiers who will serve in this war in behalf of our country, I want to say that this is the greatest hodge-podge that has ever been brought before this Congress or any other Congress. Let us get down to concrete illustrations. When I interrogated the gentleman who reported out this bill yesterday he seemed to be very much perturbed. He stated that he knew all about this bill, and I grant you that he knows all about it. But in answer to a question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] he said, in his opinion, a one-armed man or a one-legged man would draw 50 per cent of the total disability, did he not? And the total disability under this bill is $40. Fifty per cent of that is $20. Do you tell me that the man who has faced the cannon and has left his arm or his leg on the altar of sacrifice to the honor and glory of his country shall have only a $20 monthly pension while the young widow whose husband has died from disease in the service receives $30?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SWITZER. I will not yield now.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the gentleman misrepresents me.

Mr. SWITZER. You can bring in all the compensation experts that you can round up between the Golden Gate and Hell Gate, but they will never convince me that it is equitable, just, and right. You can call on the Secretary of the Treasury to approve it, and the Interstate Commerce Committee of this House, yea, although it is indorsed by the President of the United States, I still remain not convinced that it is just and equitable. Why, do you suppose that the people of this country are going to stand for your granting a pension of $20 or $30 a month to a man who has lost his arm or his leg, and who, perchance, has a wife at home, and who comes back and in 10 or 15 years dies, and if she can not prove that the loss of his arm or his leg caused his death the widow will draw no pension, while the widow of a man who is killed in service gets a pension of $30? Do you say that is just and right?

Now, I do not want to censure this committee, except only in this: They did not give full consideration to this matter. I propose to offer, if some one else does not, an amendment providing that a man who loses an arm or a leg, or a man who loses a hand, or a man who is rendered totally deaf, shall have a pension of not less than $40 a month, if you put the basic pension at $40 for total disability. Gentlemen, do you not believe that the one-legged man, or the one-armed man, ought to have $40 if you are going to pay the widow $30? Let us be reasonable about this thing.

Now, I will just state this as to the insurance proposition, that if no one else offers an amendment, I propose to offer an amendment that each soldier will be given $5,000 insurance. It will be compulsory during the war; it will provide that we will commandeer $40 of his pay with which to pay that insurance. That is, if you want to democratize the man in the trenches over in Europe, as you say, why not democratize this insurance proposition? Certainly you can not go before the people and say to them that a proposition such as you have brought in here, which experts say will result in only 25 per cent, who will each take out $2,500 insurance. You do not believe that the people are going to be satisfied with a law that will work out such gross and glaring inequality, do you? Certainly you can not believe that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Subsequently,

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that he made a mistake in counting the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] on account of the clock here. The Chair finds that the gentleman from Ohio has four minutes more. If he desires to use it, he can do so now.

Mr. SWITZER. I thought the time was pretty short. I think I would like to use it. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who reported out this bill. He wanted to interrogate me. What was it?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have forgotten what it was.

Mr. SWITZER. He yielded to me, and I do not want to fail to reciprocate the courtesy. It will probably take half an hour for me to say what I want to say on this subject.

But, gentlemen, it does seem to me that if you must adopt an insurance feature here it ought to be in a separate act. This compensation is nothing more nor less than a pension, and it ought to be in a separate act. The other feature ought to be in a separate act. The sum the soldier contributes must be paid by the War Department. Why not administer it as it was done during the trouble on the Mexican border? But when it comes to the insurance proposition, what will happen? You say that 25 per cent will take out $2,500 each. It might be paid during the war and it might be forfeited. But when the war is over a great many of these men will probably allow the policy to lapse, even if they undertake to pay only $8 as the rate. In a few years, or, say, in 10 or 20 or 30 years, the policy will lapse in many cases because some misfortune overtakes the policyholder; so that it will be a gamble. If you will adopt my theory and make this compulsory and commandeer a part of a man's pay during the war they will all have equal protection during the war. Of course, after the war it will all be a gamble, as it will be under the theory expressed and as it will work out in this bill. If it is a good thing, why not compel them to take it? Why not teach them the value of insurance by making them pay this premium during the time they will receive this pay? Even a man who has a family will have $180 left each year after you take off half for his family. Most of them, I suppose, will not have families. It will not burden them with much greater hardships and it will equalize this matter.

I think the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is absolutely right. What you want in this pension law more than anything else is equality, and if it is true that you have established this new bureau and tried to dissociate it from the pension system by calling it an "insurance and compensation system," no one can get an increase under it for the widows of the Civil War or of the Spanish War, who occupy the same status as will the widows under this bill, by offering an amendment. You say you are not responsible for these acts as to the Civil War widows and the Spanish-American War widows. Those acts were compromise measures. We are all for pensioning the soldiers. Why not eliminate the palpable and glaring inequalities pensioning soldiers' widows? Why not fix that little matter now while we are all together? [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, not being a member of the committee which has had under consideration the soldiers' insurance act, which we are now considering, I have not given it the consideration that would justify me in imposing my views concerning the bill upon you. I have read the report of the hearings of the committee and the majority and minority reports, and I shall give close attention to the debate. I believe that this Committee of the Whole will report to the House a bill that I can and will heartily approve. It is a war measure, and while I have not approved of all the provisions of the various war measures that have been hurried through Congress here, I have deemed it my duty to support the administration generally in its efforts to win this war and have voted for every law so proposed, except the rivers and harbors bill, which was not a war measure, and which I deemed an outrageous imposition upon our people at this time; and with the same spirit I shall continue to support and uphold the hands of those who are in the places of tremendous responsibilities as my country is entering into this most terrible war, the end of which we can not see. I do not mean by that that I will be a "rubber stamp," as was the boast of one former Member on my side of the House, but I will not through narrow partisanship or personal likes or dislikes be an obstructionist and thus weaken the arms of those responsible for the conduct of the war, and thereby give comfort to the enemy.

In voting for this bill I am not alone actuated by the promise that it will do away with the pension system, because I am not so sure, but that those who follow us will not look with as equal favor upon that system as do we and as did our fathers. I believe that the brave men who are going across the ocean to fight under the flag we love, and their loved ones at home, expect of us at this time some such generous, thoughtful consideration as the principle of the bill would warrant; and its speedy passage will, I hope, give heart and encouragement to our 100,000,000 people who at this hour are stunned at the realization of the tremendousness of the task we are undertaking.

We must win this war at all costs. In order to do so, we must overlook nothing that will help to bring about that result. We must not think alone of what happens in Europe, but we must keep our own matchless industrial institutions going all the time. I have just returned from the great State of Indiana—that splendid center of industry and thrift. I have the honor to represent a district in that State which is one of the great coal centers of the world; and while there I studied anew my people's needs and conditions in connection with the needs of the Nation at this hour. A closer study of the conditions of the Nation as affecting the mining interests of my State, and they are doubtless no different in other mining fields, brought forth astonishing facts, which, in part, I want to transmit to you at this time.

The mills and shops and furnaces and factories of this Nation are being mobilized to the most tremendous output of products, necessary to the successful conduct of the war, that the world has ever known. All their success in this direction is wholly dependent upon having a sufficient supply of coal at hand to make the power to run the plants. You will recall that I asked you last May to exempt from the draft the man who digs the coal, and that I cited you to the example of England, who was sending her Welsh coal miners back home from the front so as to furnish the coal necessary for her industries and navy. I do not know what we are going to do for miners in the coal fields, but they will have to be found somewhere if we get enough coal to supply the Nation's unusual needs. But for the present I found the most pressing need of the mining industry was for railroad cars to haul the coal. I found some of the largest mines, employing hundreds of men, working a little more than one-half time on account of car shortage—an enormous and very unfortunate economic waste that must not continue if we are to do our best in this struggle. You who read the administration organ called the Official Bulletin this morning no doubt noticed that there is talk of turning off the electric and gas street lights of our cities at night in order to save coal. Are we, this great, rich Nation, going to permit the lack of freight cars to hamper our proper and speedy mobilization of our great industries? Yet when I dig into the facts and figures of the case I find no well-aimed attempt on the part of those in charge is being made to relieve this astounding condition that must eventually seriously handicap our ability to make the most of our opportunities. Let me give you some figures.

In 1915 we had in the United States 2,356,338 freight cars of all kinds, or 9.48 cars to the mile of railroad, made up as follows:

Box cars, 1,041,033, or 4.042 per mile.

Flat cars, 145,192, or 0.564 per mile.

Stock cars, 86,312, or 0.335 per mile.

Coal cars, 900,780, or 3.497 per mile.

Tank cars, 9,513, or 0.037 per mile.

Refrigerator cars, 52,443, or 0.204 per mile.

Caboose and other freight cars of all kinds, about 16,934.

Company service cars, 95,934, or 0.372 per mile.

It is now claimed by those most familiar with the situation that we probably have in service something like two and a half million freight cars. Remember, these are the cars available for normal conditions.

There are only nine shops of consequence turning out freight cars. They say that their full capacity is, in round figures, 300,000 cars per year; and they also say—and we have a right to rely on the information given, when given under the circumstances that these facts were given—that at present they are turning out probably a little less than 50 per cent of their capacity, or less than 150,000 cars a year. The railroads themselves turn out at full capacity about 20,000 cars per year. The best figure obtainable is that this year's output of freight cars will be from 135,000 to 150,000 cars. I am informed that it is a common saying among well-posted car men that it requires 200,000 cars yearly to take the place of those being put out of commission. Now, if our available yearly output is less than 150,000, and if we junk 200,000 per year, where are we getting to? Why, Mr. Chairman, I will tell you where. The car-service committee are now issuing drastic orders that stop the wheels of industry at one place until another place is supplied. If preferential shipments are ordered already, with paralyzing effect, what may we expect within the next year or two if the war continues—and we must not fail to prepare for its duration for at least that long?

You will also ask, Why the car shortage? Here are some of the reasons: Foreign trade has increased 100 per cent; domestic trade has increased 50 per cent; great numbers of cars are used transferring parts and material before assembling or manufacturing begins; the extraordinary high cost and scarcity of steel and materials and labor; instead of 500,000 emigrants to draw from for labor, there has been but few; we have been and are now supplying foreign nations with cars; we are building 400 miles of railroad in France and equipping it with cars and locomotives; 8,997 freight cars are under order for France, and 914 locomotives are to go to the same place, to be used with our Army.

The president of one of our large railroads penetrating the coal fields of the Middle West wrote me this week that a hundred million dollars, the amount I have asked the Government to use, would build a hundred thousand freight cars. I think, under the speeding-up process, it will cost perhaps $1,500 per car, which would give us 65,000 cars. This would not near equal the present demand.

This same railroad president writes further:

It will be a great help to the general situation to have these cars, and with the Government going in the market for 4 per cent money, it is pretty hard for the railroads to get sufficient funds with which to expand. Then, too, the railroads are deferred somewhat in the purchase of new equipment, by reason of the high prices of materials, which would not influence the Government so much.

This might be handled by the Government undertaking to purchase the equipment bonds put out by the railroads, allowing the railroads themselves to make the purchase of the equipment and giving the Government some control over the equipment until the debt is paid off. This would avoid the creation of an agency which the Government would have to have if it owned the equipment. While the scheme is necessarily a large one and would require much more careful consideration than I have been able to give it, I do believe it would be helpful not only to the railroads but to the general situation, and I am sure the railroads will be glad to use the equipment on any fair basis. It is certain to help the Indiana situation to have this number of new cars on the railroads. As it is now, our cars get away from us and are used for other purposes than hauling coal, so whether the new cars find their way to the coal fields or not, their presence will certainly benefit the general situation.

Now, one thing is sure, the railroads can not and will not build these extra freight cars which we so sorely need. The shipbuilders could not or would not build ships as fast as we needed them. Did you wait and twirl your thumbs? No; you went into the shipbuilding business, and I want to know why you do not handle this question in the same way?

Some one will say, If these nine car-manufacturing plants can not get the materials and labor to increase their output, how do you expect the Government to do so? How is the Government building ships? Where does it get its materials and men to build them with? Uncle Sam can build the cars or cause them to be built, and, in my judgment, it is the only way we will get them.

The bill I introduced last Tuesday, being House bill 4919, authorizes the President, through the Interstate Commerce Commission or other person or persons, as he sees fit, subject to his approval, to acquire or construct out of the appropriation provided for in the bill of $100,000,000, freight cars to be sold to the railroad companies on such as terms as he thinks proper.

I desire at this place in my remarks to insert a copy of the bill in the RECORD:

A bill (H. R. 5919) authorizing the President to acquire or construct freight cars for the transportation of coal and other products and commodities, and making an appropriation therefor.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to expend $100,000,000 out of the sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for ships, or, in his discretion, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction or acquirement of freight cars to be used in the transportation by the railroad companies of the United States of coal and other products and commodities, pursuant to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes," approved August 10, 1917; and in the execution of this authority for the acquirement and construction of said cars the President may exercise all the powers heretofore conferred upon him by law with reference to ships. The President may direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to exercise the power hereby vested in him, or he may designate such other person or persons as he sees fit to exercise said power and authority, subject to his approval; and the cars so acquired or constructed shall be used by the railroad companies under such terms and for such compensation as may be approved by the President, and, as far as possible, under agreements providing for the purchase of such cars by the railroad companies receiving them. The President shall cause to be made public monthly information as to the number of cars acquired and constructed, the names of contractors and the terms of contracts, and the disposition of the cars; and he shall submit a detailed report to Congress at its next regular session of each and all operations and expenditures pursuant to this act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we know that the car shortage is already alarming, and must necessarily get more so in the future. The railroads and car factories can give us no hope, and they fear a greater shortage of new cars in the immediate future. Preferential shipment orders will only change the location of the distress and will not aid materially in moving our enormous amount of freight, which is steadily increasing and which must increase as the war progresses.

What are we to do, Mr. Chairman—sit here until this certain condition further paralyzes our usefulness, or shall we act upon the question now while there is time? I am not here advocating this bill for the benefit of the railroads, because they should be made to pay full value, on proper terms, for these cars. No one has ever accused me of being influenced against my better judgment by a railroad company. As the author of the 2-cent-fare law in Indiana I probably received my share of criticism from the railroad fellows. This is an extraordinary condition, and it is for the welfare of my country at war that prompts me to speak at this time. It is no time to theorize about Government ownership. This proposition is not a proposal for Government ownership, because I only propose that we build and acquire for the purpose of disposal—that we build to meet a condition that is truly alarming. I hope, gentlemen, that you will carefully weigh this proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in order to take as little of the time of the House as possible I want in advance to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not expect to go into a lengthy explanation of the minor details of the bill. The supplemental report by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] certainly does explain the provisions of the bill in its details and with accuracy. Then the gentleman [Mr. RAYBURN] spent two hours and a quarter on this floor explaining every detail of the bill orally. Consequently, it seems to me that the details have been very well and fully explained.

What I want to say about this bill is as a whole, rather than as to details, because the details can be worked out, and will be worked out in conference, with every opportunity to make every investigation as to details that may be necessary.

Now, some gentlemen contend that because there are four parts to this bill, the four functions should be exercised and carried out by four different departments or bureaus of the Government; that so much as affects the Navy should be administered by the Navy Department; that so much as affects the Military Establishment should be administered and carried out by the War Department; that so much as affects compensation should be administered by the Pension Bureau of the Interior Department.

And most of those gentlemen who seem to think that the bill ought to be divided up do not seem to think that the insurance part of it ought to be administered by any department; because as a rule they are opposed to insurance of any kind for the soldier, in any real and true sense of insurance.

This bill and its general purposes were worked out by a committee, not of the House of Representatives nor of the Senate, but by a committee of gentlemen who have given a great deal of thought to all purposes sought to be accomplished, and it was thought and believed by that committee that the one paramount purpose is to take care of the soldier's family to the best advantage so far as this war is concerned, and in order to do it to the best advantage the administration should be unified; and if it is to be unified and centralized, of course, one board ought to administer the law in all its provisions. There having been a war-risk insurance bureau created since the European war began, which insured vessels and cargoes, and the law afterwards being amended so as to require the masters of vessels to insure their seamen, it was thought wise to amend that law and provide that the board thereby created should have charge of his whole administration.

You gentlemen who have had long experience in this House know that a commission or board, as a rule, magnifies its particular duties, and is all the time asking for increased facilities and increased appropriations. Now, if you have the allowances, the compensations, the allotments, and insurance, all administered and carried out by one board or one commission, we will not have a competitive duplication of services and expenses, and conflicting rules and regulations.

One gentleman, by his remarks, left the impression that he thought the Secretary of the Treasury was trying to magnify himself through this bill. I do not know what the motives of the Secretary of the Treasury were, any more than I know the motives of the gentleman who made the indirect criticism; but if the Secretary of the Treasury can and does perform all his manifold duties to the public, with the manifest public and patriotic purposes that actuate him in his support and advocacy of this bill, he will magnify himself in popular estimation second to no other public official in our whole country. The Secretary of the Treasury does not take all credit for this bill, does not take credit for all its splendid provisions. It was considered by a committee composed of many gentlemen, not seekers of public office, some of them already hold public offices who can not possibly magnify the benefits of offices they now hold by the splendid patriotic service which they have rendered. One of the gentlemen, who was chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Labor of the Council of National Defense, who prepared this bill and who gave most illuminating testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, in support of the bill, is a gentleman holding a Federal office for life. That gentleman is no other than Judge Mack, of the Circuit Court of Appeals, and this country never will get through paying him the debt of gratitude it owes him for the splendid, uncompensated, zealous work he has given the public in the preparation of this bill. As a judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, instead of taking the usual summer vacation, without money, without compensation, without hope of winning any office thereby, he has done as much, or even more, than the Secretary of the Treasury or any other one individual in promoting this splendid legislation.

This bill was prepared, as a whole, with its compensation, allowances, and the insurance features considered as a whole; and if we strike out the insurance feature, then the whole bill ought to be revised. If we strike out family allowances, then all the rest of the bill ought to be revised, and will have to be. There is but one way to treat the objects of this bill, and that is as a whole, as this bill treats them. Therefore I am opposed to each and every amendment, made by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the bill that is not merely formal, because in the little time we had to weigh the effect of each one of these amendments upon the provisions of the bill, taken as a whole, we did not have the necessary knowledge and did not have time in which to acquire it, and when we begin the reading of the bill by paragraphs for amendment I shall do what I can to defeat any and all of those amendments.

I see we have very vigorous opposition to this bill by our gallant and able young friend from Ohio [Mr. KEY], chairman of the Committee on Pensions in the House of Representatives, who is certainly doing his duty in the most creditable way as chairman of that committee. I attribute to him nothing but the purest and best motives, as much so as we all assume for ourselves in considering this legislation. But my friend presides over a committee that has jurisdiction of pension legislation. Our public pension laws allow a widow $12 a month and $2 additional for each child. Can anyone claim that that amount is anything like just compensation or maintenance? And yet we do not condemn the whole pension system simply because we find an injustice in some particular part of it.

This law is not intended to supplant or take the place of existing pension laws as to any past war, but only as to the soldiers and sailors of this war.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SIMS. Just for a question. Do not spoil my speech, please.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I hope I will not.

Mr. SIMS. Because the gentleman, no doubt, can make a much abler one than I can.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If I understand this bill aright, the soldiers in this war will not have a pensionable status under any existing law, and for a soldier to receive any benefits in the way of a pension, or so-called compensation, his only relief would be to apply under this proposed law, should he receive a disability. The only status he will have will be under this bill, and he will have his rights adjudicated in this new so-called bureau that is to be lodged in and administered through the Treasury Department. Is not that correct?

Mr. SIMS. My friend has made a statement instead of asking a question.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I am asking you if that is not correct.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to debate that question at this time. The gentleman has made a statement, and it would be absolutely discourteous for me to say the gentleman was mistaken about it, because he is chairman of the Pensions Committee and ought to know more about it than I.

Now, there is no insidious, indirect attack on our present pension laws by reason of this bill. Gentlemen keep insisting that compensation is a pension. That contention can not possibly apply to a service pension. The laws that we first passed after the Civil War granting pensions were for injuries received in the service, and were in the nature of compensation and based upon the extent of the injury sustained. That was compensation, or compensatory, and in that respect, and that only, is the present bill at all similar to pension laws—the compensation feature of it. But compensation pensions would perhaps never have reached a volume exceeding $50,000,000 per annum on account of the Civil War; but we know it is a fact that the northern Democrats and the northern Republicans—and they are just as good as any other kind of Democrats and Republicans—vied with each other in proclaiming their devotion to the old soldier, their love for him, and their desire not to compensate him simply but to donate something to him.

And so finally a service pension act was passed in 1890 or 1891, over 20 years after the war, during all of which time these men had received no pension, asked for no pension, having received no service injury. Such pensions were pure gratuities, nothing more and nothing less. We kept on increasing these gratuitous pensions until finally when they reach the age of 70 they get $30 a month for the balance of their lives.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That depends on the length of service.

Mr. SIMS. It is not to compensate them, it is not to compensate them for any injury received as a soldier. It is a pure gratuity, and regardless of the financial condition of the recipient of the pension. If he is a bachelor and has a million dollars income he gets the same pension as does a man with a large family without a dollar of this world's goods.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. He would get that under the general law.

Mr. SIMS. That is what I am talking about, the general law.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I thought the gentleman was talking about a service pension.

Mr. SIMS. A service pension under the general law.

Now, you accuse us in the South of being selfish, and you accuse us of bringing on the war that made it necessary to pension anybody. It got so that on private-pension-bill days, when we were granting private pensions or the increase of pensions beyond what the general law gave, which they could get under the general law without violating the letter of the law, but who were within its equity, some gentlemen got to filibustering, as it was charged, got to asking that each bill be explained and discussed. So finally, in order to prevent that sort of consideration, a rule was brought in providing for only three or five minutes' debate on any private pension bill, and so they were passed practically without consideration by the House. From that day to this, with rare exceptions, has there ever been the slightest attempt to consider on the floor of the House a private pension bill. The Invalid Pensions Committee and the Committee on Pensions can have general rules for the consideration of these bills before the committee, but when we get on the floor of the House and an amendment is offered to increase a pension and tear-shedding speeches are made over the condition of the pensioner, the House goes wild and votes for almost anything. My friends, I served on the Committee on Pensions when I first came here. It is one of the first committees I ever served on in the House. I therefore had an opportunity to know how private pension bills are passed.

Now, we are going into a war and nobody knows how many millions of men will be in it. When will compensation be worth the most to a man—20 years after the war, after he is 70 years old, or at the time when the injury is first inflicted?

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The purpose of this bill, or one portion of the bill, is to compensate the soldier. Before America entered into this war there were hundreds of young Americans who entered the Ambulance Corps and the Red Cross Hospital Corps in a foreign army, fighting for the principle which we are now contending for. They are not recognized in this bill at all, are they?

Mr. SIMS. They may not be.

Mr. REAVIS. Many of these boys will return to America physically maimed. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea to amend the bill so that they will receive the same recognition that a drafted soldier will receive?

Mr. SIMS. I said when I began that I was not going to discuss the details of the bill. Now, I do not know why they were not included, and the same with reference to why the Army field clerks and others were not included. The bill may be amended in this House or in the other body, but I have not time in 40 minutes to do the subject justice if I have to go into a lot of details. I am sorry that I am not prepared to give the gentleman a satisfactory answer.

Mr. REAVIS. I have been waiting for the gentleman to speak, knowing that he has given great attention to the bill and that I had confidence in his judgment. I would like to have some one instrumental in framing the bill give a reason why the American boy with a dependent at home who has entered the service other than the military and naval service of the United States, who is sacrificing his life for the same principle that we are fighting for, should not be represented in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Let me say to the gentleman, at the risk of violating a committee rule, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], members of the committee, after the bill came before us, were appointed to investigate and report an amendment covering that question, but as I have not heard it discussed and have not asked them in relation to it, I do not want to go into the details.

Mr. RAYBURN. What men is it that the gentleman wants covered?

Mr. REAVIS. Well, take the young men that Germany outrageously bombarded in the hospital the other day. They have been killing American boys, wounding and maiming them, who were fighting for the principle which we are now fighting for. Why should not they be compensated as well as the private soldier?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman means men not in the service of the United States but of some other Government?

Mr. REAVIS. I mean men not in the naval or military service of the United States but, anticipating the action of our Government in entering this war, went abroad to fight for that principle. Why should not we care for them and their dependent when they return to their homes?

Mr. RAYBURN. If they come under our service after we declared war, they will be taken care of.

Mr. REAVIS. They could not come under the service of America if they were under another flag. Those countries would not release them.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know. There is nothing—

Mr. REAVIS. And if they have dependents here, why should not we provide for them?

Mr. RAYBURN. There is nothing in this bill to take care of that.

Mr. SIMS. I misunderstood the gentleman's question. I thought it had reference to those serving in our ambulance corps.

Mr. REAVIS. I mean those American boys who are now doing their part in fighting this war who are not provided for in this bill.

Mr. DYER. Have not they sworn allegiance to those countries?

Mr. REAVIS. What difference does it make whether they have or not? They will come back to this country and renew their allegiance.

Mr. DYER. They can not have allegiance to two countries at the same time.

Mr. REAVIS. They will come back to this country and renew their allegiance.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is discussing something that is not in the bill and is taking up my time.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. I just want to know what consideration the gentleman has given to the question of the Army field clerks.

Mr. SIMS. The Committee on Interstate and foreign Commerce appointed a special committee to investigate and report on that question—Mr. DECKER and Mr. COADY—to prepare and offer an amendment to take care of those clerks. I do not know that they will do so, but they were appointed for that purpose. They may not recommend such an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the whole fight on this bill has been made, first, by those who are afraid that it may disturb the existing pension laws or that future Congresses will disregard it and give pensions anyway. The other is the insurance companies' fight. I will admit we can not bind our successors. We can not bind the people who live after us. Even the Constitution can not bind them, because they can amend, alter, change, or abolish it; but shall we not do that which we conceive to be to the public interest now, supposing our successors will be as wise and patriotic as we are trying to be now?

I will admit that where compensation is allowed and at the time the board fixes the compensation we will say it is based on 30 per cent of total disability. That disability may be progressive, it may be a disease, his disability may increase, and the board ought to have the power, if it is not in the bill, to revise, to increase the compensation which would take away all claim for a pension for a service injury. My friends, on the insurance feature, the committee from the insurance companies before our committee did not claim that the insurance provided in this bill for the enlisted men of the Army and Navy would tend to create a demand on the part of the public who are not in the Army and Navy, and never expect to be, to be insured by the Government at similar rates or approaching similar rates. I do not see where there is any ground upon which to base such a fear. The bill is confined to the Army and Navy. The Government pays the expenses of the Army and Navy, and if the men insure in private companies at private-company rates to be paid by the Government at private-company rates and our Army should be increased to a vast number, the insurance might be beyond all possibility of payment, and therefore to say you are opposed to the Government insuring the enlisted men of the Army and Navy is to say that you are opposed to their families having the benefit of insurance which they could get at reasonable rates if they were not in the Army and Navy. That is the logic of opposition. The Government out of the public taxes pays nothing except the excess over peace rates. The soldier, the enlisted man of the Army and Navy, pays what he would have to pay if he were not in the Army or Navy. The Government steps in and during the war assumes only the risk of having to pay for the death or the total disability or partial disability of the soldier incurred while in service. Now, that is all. Why should not the Government assume it? The Government is compelling the man by statute law in case of the drafted soldiers to perform this service for the Government, for the whole people, at his personal individual risk and sacrifice and that of his family. It has made it impossible for him to get insurance at a rate that he can pay, and yet the spirit of greed and private gain rises up here and says, "Deny this man this plain, simple act of justice for fear that some people after the war, who are not in the condition of this soldier in that respect, will want the Government to insure them also and at the same rates."

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. For a question.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman state the name of one insurance company in this country that has offered opposition to this bill by virtue of the insurance section incorporated in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. That is the only thing they do object to about it.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman name a company that objects to it?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman read Mr. Ide's statement, did he not?

Mr. LONERGAN. I did.

Mr. SIMS. He represented the insurance companies; he was chairman of their committee. He says the insurance article is vicious and ought not to be passed.

Mr. LONERGAN. I will say to the gentleman that in my home city of Hartford, Conn., the center of the insurance business of this country, that the insurance interests of that city do not object to that insurance feature of this bill or giving any form of compensation to the enlisted man. They have offered some valuable suggestions as to how the bill, in their opinion, can be improved. I have conveyed them to the committee. It should be solely a war measure, but we should deal justly and generously with the enlisted men and their dependents.

Mr. SIMS. I am delighted to hear it. I want to yield for such testimony as that.

Mr. LONERGAN. They are patriotic men.

Mr. SIMS. They are patriotic men and this is a patriotic purpose. But I must say that the only objections that have been made are to the possible effect upon pensions and the question of insurance.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman state how many insurance companies this Mr. Ide represented in his opposition to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know.

Mr. HUSTED. I think there are only three or four in the list printed in the record.

Mr. SIMS. That is all I have to go by.

Mr. HUSTED. He did not represent any others.

Mr. SIMS. I am mighty glad to find out that the insurance people do not object to this bill. If they do not object to it, and the soldiers do not object to it, and their families do not object to it, and the pensioners do not object, why do Members of this House raise objections that nobody else but themselves conjure up?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to ask as a matter of information, because I have confidence not only in the gentleman's knowledge but in his long years of service. I confess the only thing that concerns me about this bill is the question of future pensions. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks that, notwithstanding the policy of this Congress, if we pass this bill it will do away with future pensions—say 50 per cent of them that take advantage of this insurance and 50 per cent that do not?

After this war shall have ended, and those who do not take advantage of it come home, say 25 per cent, with empty trousers' legs or empty sleeves or lost health, are going around the streets of the towns of our various congressional districts, does not the gentleman think that that of itself would create such a unanimity of sentiment that it would absolutely force Congress to grant those men pensions in years to come?

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely, no; emphatically, no. You have spoken of those soldiers coming home with empty sleeves. Such men will be provided for. Such men are allowed compensation in excess of the present pension allowance for such an injury.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand the gentleman to say that they would be allowed under this bill a pension in excess of what is provided in existing law.

Mr. SIMS. Any compensation and family allowance paid by the Government exceeds any benefits by pension laws on the statute books as a whole.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Go ahead and differ. I may be wrong and you may be right. But here is what I said to you before: The pension laws never would have become a burden if the one-legged men and the one-armed men had been the only beneficiaries, and had the beneficiaries been confined to those who had received injuries and incurred diseases while in the service.

But this might take place, as I said a while ago. A man will start out and be compensated for 50 per cent disability. It may have been due to disease. That disease might be progressive, and afterwards his disability might become 75 per cent. That would be the only grounds on which to increase it. Now, right there, I am in favor—and I do not say it is not in the bill—that if the board found his disability at the beginning 50 per cent and by a later reexamination his disability had increased, due to the same cause, then the board might increase his allowance up to 75 per cent of the total disability if such disability then existed. Now, that does not give any excuse under heaven to give a man a pension who never smelled gunpowder and served only 90 days and was out of gunshot all the time he served.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Now, just another question. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under the provisions of this bill every soldier, notwithstanding he may not take advantage of this insurance, who claims by reason of his service a larger compensation—

Mr. SIMS. He will have to be in the service at the time he receives his injury. Life insurance is simply permissive and supplementary. All the balance of it is mandatory, and takes effect regardless of whether he asks for it or does not ask for it.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Texas will give me more time I will be glad to answer any question that I can answer.

Mr. KEATING. The question I want to ask is for information. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the soldier who suffered disability in the service of his country would receive greater compensation under this bill than under existing pension laws.

Mr. SIMS. Including family allowance to go with it.

Mr. KEATING. That is a very important point. I am inclined to think it is necessary to amend the pension features of this bill. The gentleman is a member of the committee and can give the House some definite information on that point. For example, let us take the soldier who is not married, who comes home totally disabled, and say that he has lost both arms. Under this bill, as I read it, the soldier would receive $40, $20 for a nurse, and if he took the maximum amount under this bill for insurance, $5,000—

Mr. SIMS. We are going to make it $10,000.

Mr. KEATING. Five thousand dollars under the bill, but $10,000, we will say. And he probably would be entitled to $25 a month under his insurance. Forty dollars and twenty dollars and twenty-five additional make a total of $85. Under existing law that same soldier would be entitled to $100 a month. That is the way I figure it. If a man is married, he would get $60 a month and $20 and $25, a total of $105 a month, or $5 more than he would get under existing law. If I am mistaken concerning those figures I wish the gentleman from Tennessee or some other Member would correct me. I wish the gentleman or some other member of the committee would point out his authority for the statement that the soldier who serves in this war and comes home minus a leg or an arm receives as great compensation under this law as under existing pension laws.

Mr. SIMS. Why, one of the very objections made against this bill is that the compensation, if the war continues any length of time, will far exceed the entire sum expended by the Pension Bureau.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will bear with me, I do not care what the objections may be. What I am asking is that the House be furnished not with objections but with facts, and I say that according to your bill the soldier who is disabled in the service of his country does not receive as great a compensation under this bill as he does under existing law. If I am mistaken on that point, I want the gentleman who now has the floor to correct me. Take a specific instance: John Smith, for example, unmarried, who lost two arms, both arms, we will say, in France, or who came back with the loss of both eyes; and let the gentleman tell us how much money he will receive.

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman is making too much of a good speech in my time.

Mr. KEATING. I am sincere about it, in the questions I am propounding.

Mr. SIMS. In 40 minutes' time I can not go into those things. I had only 40 minutes, and now you ask me to go into a 40-minute controversy over details. It is unreasonable. Every detail of this bill may be improved. I want to talk about the insurance feature of this bill in general.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes left.

Mr. SIMS. You see, gentlemen, you have taken almost all my time. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania give me three minutes more?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. That will make six minutes. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. If the statement made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is a fact, what is the use of this bill at all?

Mr. SIMS. He singles out a young man who loses both arms or both legs and states what he is getting now and undertakes to judge of the whole bill by that.

Mr. KEATING. No; I would not like to have the gentleman think that I condemn the entire bill. I think these provisions should be scrutinized and, if possible, amended on the floor of the House.

Mr. SNYDER. I thought from the gentleman's statement he thought there was no use for this measure.

Mr. SIMS. Any member of the committee or any Member of the House may offer any amendment, and if it is a good one it will be adopted. I am opposed to amending the general scope and purpose of the bill, because it has been thought out and systematized as a whole.

Now, some gentlemen have stated directly and some have intimated by insinuation and otherwise that this measure is socialistic, and therefore they want it strictly construed and confined to the exact purposes of the bill. It is so confined. The bill can not go further than its terms provide. It provides for the Army and the Navy. But some gentlemen have contended that the bill should be amended so that this insurance should continue only during the war, or for a short period thereafter, and that the board should cease to exist. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] showed very clearly why the board, or some board administering the law, would have to continue the administrative features of it, because the soldiers will not die, we hope, just as soon as they get out of the service and before this board winds up its duties.

Consequently you will have to have some body, some board, somewhere to continue to administer the law and continue collecting the premiums and paying the losses as they occur. We provide that the losses may be paid by per annum installments, by regulations, and it ought to be so provided. Lump sums rarely help anybody, as a rule, in maintaining a family. They are in the nature of getting rich quick and spending it quick. That will be one of the strongest reasons for coming back to Congress and asking for pensions. The beneficiaries under a pension system do not begin to draw pension until the death of the soldier. This insurance is to continue during a long period of years, and it is to be paid by installments in order that there may be no excuse for people coming back to Congress and further insisting on additional compensation or additional pension.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman please state upon what theory the committee operates when it proposes to have this insurance continued for the men who are known as insurable risks after the termination of the war?

Mr. SIMS. I think for the best reason in the world. The insurance and the compensation allowance and the compensation or salary or wages paid ought all to include, at least indirectly, the compensative inducements for a man to volunteer and to willingly accept service and perform the duties of his position as a soldier or when not a volunteer; and remember that under the bill the insurance is only term insurance during the war. After the war the soldier may continue it as term insurance, but it may be changed by regulation to some other form of insurance. But remember, if he continues it as term insurance he has got to pay more every year—pay it himself—and if it is continued in some other form he will immediately have to pay more than he pays during his actual service. Now we deprive him of an opportunity to get $8 insurance when he is at the $8 age. Then after the war, when he has passed the $8 age, why turn him loose to the tender mercies of the insurance companies?

Mr. LONERGAN. I am talking of the men who are known as insurable risks. Could not those men go out and get insurance with private companies?

Mr. SIMS. Before they go into the war?

Mr. LONERGAN. No; after they return from the war.

Mr. SIMS. If they have performed the service and have not got killed or injured. If they do get killed or injured, you put the burden on the Government without giving the Government the benefit of the money paid in by healthy men who will not die as soon as they are insured.

Mr. LONERGAN. Then, is it the theory of the committee that the men who are known as insurable risks shall contribute by the payment of their premiums toward the maintenance of this bureau, instead of having it maintained by the Government?

Mr. SIMS. There is no maintenance charge included in any premium charge.

Mr. LONERGAN. I understand that, but there has got to be a fund created to pay this insurance whenever it matures or whenever a man dies.

Mr. SIMS. That will be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. LONERGAN. Then, is it the theory of the committee and the purpose of this bill that the men who are the insurable risks, who could get insurance elsewhere, shall contribute their premiums for the purpose of adding to that fund out of which the matured insurance shall be paid?

Mr. SIMS. They are volunteers so far as insurance is concerned, even during the war, and after the war they can change their insurance to such form as they may want it, as provided for by regulations, or they can drop out and insure in a private company if they wish to. Now, why not leave it to the good judgment of the soldier who is insured whether he will continue it as term insurance or in some other way, or quit and take insurance from some company?

Mr. LONERGAN. Does the gentleman believe that the United States Government should engage in the general insurance business, or does he believe that this should be confined solely to the enlisted men?

Mr. SIMS. The bill confines it absolutely to enlisted men in the Army and Navy.

Mr. LONERGAN. I understand that.

Mr. SIMS. And what is the use of putting hypothetical questions about a matter that is not before us, and neither directly nor indirectly involved in this bill?

Mr. LONERGAN. I understand that it is not.

Mr. SIMS. What is the use of asking my opinion of State insurance, which opinion would be worth nothing to the House, because that is not proposed or presented in this bill?

Mr. LONERGAN. I wish the gentleman would answer my other question, as to whether or not he believes that the men who are insurable risks after the close of the war shall by the premiums that they pay contribute in the payment of the maturity, either because of death or the expiration of a term policy, of the other men whose insurance has been continued by the Government.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman mean to imply that they should cease to pay anything after the war?

Mr. LONERGAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMS. Then, how can a man remain insured and not continue to pay for his insurance year by year, or by the term?

Mr. LONERGAN. The point I am trying to make is this—

Mr. SIMS. You are asking if they should continue.

Mr. LONERGAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. It is not compulsory. We leave it to them.

Mr. LONERGAN. Is it the purpose of the proposed law that those men known as insurable risks shall be continued in this insurance department of the Government for the purpose of helping the Government pay the maturities?

Mr. SIMS. Why, to let them stay in it if they want to for the purpose of continuing their own protection.

Mr. LONERGAN. The statement was made on the floor yesterday by some gentleman who spoke that the insurable risks should be continued by the Government in order to assist the Government in the payment of matured policies. I wanted to know whether that was the gentleman's idea.

Mr. SIMS. I suppose the gentleman has this in his mind, that there is very little danger, perhaps, of the Government for a long time having to pay the insurance on the insurable risks. Meanwhile it is getting the contributions of those insurable risks to help pay the insurance that may be due the men who are no longer insurable risks and who could not get into a private company.

Mr. LONERGAN. That is what I wanted to know. I am interested to have your opinion on the subject.

Mr. SIMS. We are leaving them in not for the purpose of aiding to do that but for their own protection and benefit, and if in securing such protection and benefit they help the Government pay these noninsurable risks, that have become noninsurable by reason of injury in the service, it is that much better for the Government.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman stated that he considered it a very desirable and good feature of this bill—and I agree with him—that the insurance should be paid in monthly installments. Now, if that is the case, does the gentleman favor the provision of the bill which permits the commutation of having a certain amount of that insurance continued a lump sum?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think there is any provision of that sort in the bill.

Mr. HUSTED. Yes, there is.

Mr. SIMS. No; the gentleman is thinking about compensation. The committee thought it wise under the particular circumstances to allow them to commute a certain amount of it. Personally I am not wedded to that part of the bill. But it was done to give the bureau the best opportunity to serve those who needed the service most.

Now I want to talk a little about the socialistic feature of this bill, for I know that it enters into the minds of many, although some men may not openly express themselves in that way. My friends, civilization itself is socialism in a degree. The only man who is not a socialist in some respects is the naked savage who has no social relations with any man but himself. He is an absolute individualist. Insurance of every kind is communistic. The individual benefits at community cost. The policyholders all go in and pay a man his losses out of the amount paid to the company by them. The whole number of insurance policyholders contribute to make up the loss of the individual policyholder.

What can be more socialistic than the public taking a man away from his family, depriving him of all his earnings as a citizen and civilian for the time being, force him to go onto the firing line and be blown to atoms, if necessary, that the whole Government, the whole community, may not be all shot to pieces or its institutions shot to pieces, which means the same thing? Is not that a little socialistic?

The words have got to be almost trite—that if we confiscate men, why not confiscate property? To ask the question is to answer it. But why should we fail to do our duty to the men that volunteer or are forced to go because of compulsion to do that which is not of any greater benefit to them or their families individually than to every other family in the Nation? Shall we do that, which is the highest possible form of socialism, and then deny him out of the public funds, which are contributed by taxing the public, something in the nature of compensation or insurance for the benefit of his family should he never return to them or should he return partially or totally disabled? If that is communism or socialism, the more we have the better for the country.

We start our young men across the ocean 3,000 miles, with every mile subject to a contact mine, subject to be blown to atoms without a moment's notice, subject to be torpedoed from beneath the surface of the sea, where no act of bravery, where no act of foreknowledge or good judgment, can possibly protect them, where they are subject to be blown up by a submarine without a moment to say good-by or write a letter home, and then go to the attack in the trenches; go where they must wear a mask to avoid the vapors of poisonous gases; go where liquid fire is played upon their living bodies, and forced to go there and be totally destroyed or maimed or wounded for life; and then shall any man stand here and cry out socialism and hide behind the idea that it is a matter of individualism and that the individual should have all the opportunities that circumstances give him and take all the misfortunes that the cruel demands of war may by compulsion be forced upon him?

Oh, they say it will lead to insurance hereafter by the Government. I do not think so. The very fact that some fear that it may lead to State insurance carries with it the implication that present private insurance is defective; it carries with it something of fear, something to cause the public to think that they have not been fairly treated. If they have not been treated fairly they have a right to remove the wrong. The management of insurance funds in the past has not been very much to the credit and honor of the insurance companies or their managers. Justice Hughes, Republican candidate for President, a great man and a good man, became famous by his investigation of the unworthy conduct of the millionaires in getting into insurance companies as directors and managing the funds for the benefit of manipulators.

Now, some talk about the expense. They say we are doing this without expense, and so we are and so we ought. I mean without expense to the applicant. They claim that we have to bear the expense. It is stated here by insurance experts that more than half of those who have taken out life insurance policies have allowed them to lapse by the third year, and they make calculations showing that 75 per cent lapse by the third year. The commissions of the agents that accrue are paid in the three years, perhaps all out of the first premium. If the business had been done as it ought to have been, why do three-fourths of those who are persuaded to go in quit by the end of three years? There is something wrong; I do not mean corruptly wrong, but there is something that is uneconomic. Therefore it is estimated that without special solicitation perhaps there will not be more than one-half that will take the insurance provided under this bill. The only excuse that ever will arise for social or state insurance in this country will arise from the fact of the failure of insurance companies to meet the public demands. The best way in the world is for them to go along and show themselves worthy of assistance and support is not to attack every possible thing they think might be used against them in the future on account of the fact that they have not done that which the public has a right to have done.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not a fact the insurance companies are carrying a great war risk already and that they are nearly all policies for one year? A great many men have taken out such policies.

Mr. SIMS. But they will not take a single man who is going to war without his paying $50 more than the Government rate.

Mr. PLATT. Is not that on account of the fact they have got a great many already?

Mr. SIMS. As far as existing policyholders of the mutual companies are concerned as a matter of course they could not take a soldier at the price the Government can. That is perfectly natural. What I am trying to meet is this argument that it will convert the whole system of insurance into a state socialistic system, that after the war Congress will permit or authorize the Government to insure anybody and everybody at the premium we are authorizing the insurance of these soldiers.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman believe we could resist the demand that will probably come from the civil service employees?

Mr. SIMS. They already have compensation.

Mr. PLATT. I mean for insurance.

Mr. SIMS. They have insurance in the form of compensation. Civil-service employees are not in extraordinary hazardous service in which they risk their lives every day they live.

Mr. PLATT. That is true, but will not they want cheap insurance?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know what they want. You and I might want a hundred thousand dollars salary, but are we ever going to get it?

Mr. PLATT. Would Members of Congress have nerve enough to resist them if they asked for it?

Mr. SIMS. I think Congress will. Let me tell you where we do not have nerve enough to resist something. I never myself have had nerve enough to resist it, and I have been here for nearly 21 years cultivating my nerve. If a man dies in this House while a Member of it the Government pays to his widow $7,500 as a gratuity, as an allowance, as a pension. Why do not we see to it that every effort to give something for nothing, when they bring in a resolution to pay the widow of a Congressman $7,500, is defeated. There is something in human nature. There is a sentiment that we can not and will not combat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SIMS. Gentlemen of the committee, I want to thank the committee very much for the kind attention which it has given me, and I am sorry I was unable to answer in detail all questions asked me. I did not refuse through any unwillingness to answer; but if I did not answer it was either because I was unable to answer or I did not want to take all of my time on mere details of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, by way of concluding my remarks at this time I will not insert the following article:

SOLDIERS' INSURANCE VERSUS PENSIONS.

[By Samuel McCune Lindsay, professor of social legislation, Columbia University.]

The principles of social insurance, applied to all sorts of risks and hazards in which the community has a stake or shares a responsibility, have been gaining in favor the world over in recent years. On the contrary, the principles of pension legislation in all countries have been found wanting and experience everywhere is leading to its abandonment.

Thirty-five years ago Germany began to apply scientific business management to the relations of government and the problems of social welfare in dealing with the public relief of distress, sickness, industrial accidents, invalidity, old age, and unemployment among wage earners. Under the masterful leadership of Bismarck, in harmony with a new national spirit and a modern sense of social responsibility and solidarity, a strongly centralized and comprehensive system of state insurance was started. Within 25 years this system not only became the characteristic and dominant feature of a powerful national government, but also became incorporated in its essential principles by the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and practically every country of Europe into a new development of democracy, a new function of government, a new attitude of peoples in their conception of the possibilities of social organization.

THE UNITED STATES A LAGGARD IN SOCIAL ORGANIZATION.

The United States alone has lagged behind and relied upon the older individualism of the poor law, administered by the smallest units of local government, upon the personal initiative of the injured person or his representatives to secure redress under the common law or the law of torts, upon employers' liability statutes, and upon equity procedure to remedy evils and achieve social justice. Of course, such methods long ago proved themselves inadequate in the face of the wonderful development of highly centralized organization, not only national but international in scope, which has characterized American industry during the past 50 years. The day of reckoning between the people and their Governments, between effective business organization of common interests and political methods which are the last resort of privateering, has been postponed by the exceptional development of private philanthropy and its extension to fields and to tasks for which it is only just now proving itself also inadequate.

THE PATCHWORK OF PENSIONS DISCREDITED.

In one great department, however, where government has had to meet a national responsibility, namely, in the relief of soldiers and sailors and their dependents, the patchwork of pensions in the United States since the Civil War, based on the principle of gratuities and political favor rather than on a sense of social justice and mutual obligation, is universally recognized as a failure. Pensions have developed in hundreds of thousands of citizens precisely the attitude of mind toward government which real democracy seeks to dispel. If the collective wealth and power of the community becomes a prize which the individual seeks to control for his own benefit, no real democracy is possible. Only as we can cultivate the feeling on the part of every individual citizen that he can be stronger, freer, and happier in proportion as every other individual in the community is made stronger, more secure, and given larger opportunities for happiness will the foundations of democracy itself be safe and its fruits increase.

DEMOCRATIC REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENTS.

We are just starting upon a world enterprise which has for its ultimate goal the democratic reorganization of the world. In the preparation of the Nation for the war there is no more striking and significant proposal that goes to the roots of our own unpreparedness, and there is no more timely and important war measure which may well test our national spirit than the proposal to provide a scientific system of social insurance instead of pensions to carry as many as possible of the risks and sacrifices of military service.

With the national purpose to participate in this world struggle for democracy defined and determined by the people themselves expressing their will in accordance with democratic principles, the conscription of men for military service on a scientific and impartial plan designed to secure those best able to render such service has been the most heartening evidence of real democracy in this country and its greatest gain in a century.

LIGHTENING THE BURDENS OF DRAFTED MEN.

The response of the people to the draft law has abundantly vindicated American patriotism and the virility of the Nation. It could have been made much easier, aroused greater enthusiasm, and contributed to the building up of an even stronger national spirit had Congress at the time it passed the draft law also enacted the war insurance bill which it has now under consideration.

Every removable fear that may naturally enter into the mind of the man called upon to give his life in defense of his country should certainly be removed. The sacrifice of comfort and economic security can not be compensated for by any wage which the Government may pay its soldiers. The degrees of sacrifice are too varied and its economic value too great for that. The anxiety, however, which the man who goes to the front naturally feels lest those who are dependent upon him for support are left unprotected, can be removed. Provision can be made not only for as strong economic protection for the comfort and welfare of the soldier's family as his own earning power gave them before he went to war, but his personal economic status, to whatever extent his earning power may be impaired if not destroyed by his military service, may also be assured.

The sooner Congress enacts the war insurance bill and thereby removes unnecessary handicaps which inevitably deter patriotic men through fear of the economic readjustments it is necessary to make, the prompter and more ready will be the response to their country's call. The cost will be great, and the challenge to business ability in the management of a highly complicated and stupendous business undertaking will be even greater. If the conscription of wealth is likewise necessary to make effective the conscription of men it will have no greater justification in any expenditure that Congress is called upon to make than in supplying the huge sums needed for the compensation and insurance of the unavoidable risks which those who fight must take and which the man at home can in this way and will cheerfully share.

WHAT THE WAR INSURANCE BILL PROPOSES.

The bill to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department proposes to add to the existing bureau which insures ships and seamen in the merchant marine against war risks a new division of military and naval insurance which will provide for three things:

- (1) Compulsory allotment of pay for support of dependents and for savings for future economic rehabilitation.
- (2) Compensation for death or injury, including disability due to disease.
- (3) Ability to get additional insurance at low cost.

THE ENLISTED MAN MUST HELP HIMSELF.

Every enlisted man in the military or naval forces of the United States must allot not to exceed one-half of his pay and not less than $15 per month for the benefit of his dependents or, if he has no dependents, to be deposited to his credit for his own benefit as a capital fund upon which the Government will pay interest and hold for him to enable him to make necessary economic readjustments after the expiration of his military service. To this compulsory allotment the enlisted man may add voluntarily from the half pay not subject to compulsory allotment and for purposes which he may choose. The Government will add a family allowance equal in amount to the monthly compulsory allotment and graded according to the relationship and number of dependents, but in no case does the Government allowance exceed $50 per month. This is payable from the time of enlistment to death in, or one month after discharge from, the service but not for more than one month after the termination of the present war emergency. For the ordinary enlisted man who receives $33 per month in foreign service, the minimum compulsory allotment might be $16.50, to which $16.50 would be added as a family allowance, thus giving his family a minimum income of $33 per month, which the man, however, might by further allotment easily increase to $50. He would have to give up only $8.50 of the other half of his pay. The Government would add another $8.50 and he would have $8 per month left, or sufficient for his own spending money.

COMPENSATION FOR DEATH OR DISABILITY.

Compensation for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the course of the service by any commissioned officer or enlisted man, or by any member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps composed of women. This compensation is graded like the compensation now provided for wage earners under workmen's compensation laws in 35 States, and under the Federal Government of the United States according to pay, and is made payable in monthly installments. It is not assignable and is exempt from taxation, attachments, and execution. It takes the place of any rights or expectations under pension laws and is expressly granted in lieu of pension. It is not operative for persons receiving service or retirement pay. The scale is a fairly liberal one, and Congress, of course, may at any time make it more liberal, but presumably would do so only under general legislation for the entire service, thus precluding the inequalities and injustices of special pension legislation. Congress can not constitutionally bind future Congresses and prevent special pension legislation, but it can, and in this law it seeks to, create so fair, liberal, and satisfactory a system of meeting every just claim impersonally and as a matter of right that it will be practically impossible for any future Congress to consider a private pension bill and highly improbable that any soldier or his dependents would seek any other remedy than that provided for under this war compensation act.

INSURANCE OF INSURABILITY.

This is a novel, constructive, and at the same time perhaps the most contentious part of the new proposal. It is a departure from the accepted principles of industrial compensation legislation and from the practice of other countries in dealing with compensation for war risks, family allowances, and pensions. It is, however, vital and essential to a fair test of the proposal to which the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have given their unqualified indorsement and without which that plan can not be fairly tested. It is the feature which specially marks this measure as a forward-looking experiment in social legislation. It is far-reaching and constructive and is a war measure in a real sense.

ADVANTAGES OF INSURANCE.

Americans are not laggards in their appreciation and use of the advantages of mutual insurance. A man fit for military service is physically the best insurable risk and can purchase insurance at the lowest commercial rate. The minute he shoulders a gun he either can not purchase insurance at all or only in a limited way at a very high and practically prohibitive rate. This bill proposes to stimulate and encourage every enlisted man to use his own resources and to make use of the facilities of insurance to protect and safeguard his interests to the limit of his resources. To do this it offers him ordinary term insurance renewable from year to year during the war and convertible at the end of the war without physical examination in such amounts as he chooses to take not to exceed $10,000, the Government agreeing to pay the difference between the cost of carrying such insurance while he is engaged in military service, estimated at about $58 per thousand, for the man of 21 years of age, and the rate which he would pay if he were not in military service, estimated at about $8 per thousand. He is given 120 days after enlistment in which to take out such amount of additional insurance as he may elect, and if he fails to exercise this privilege and dies or becomes totally disabled within this period he will be considered as insured and the benefit paid to his family.

The insurance is payable only in monthly installments to the beneficiary during life. The maximum amount of $10,000 is estimated to yield about $25 per month, which for the enlisted man when added to his compensation for death or disability as based on his rate of pay is none too liberal to maintain a decent standard of living for his family deprived of its breadwinner.

The insurance companies do not favor State insurance nor like the idea of the Government going into the insurance business. They appreciate, however, the advertising value for the insurance business in general of this feature of the war-insurance bill.

WHAT IT COSTS THE GOVERNMENT AND THE INSURED.

Without compulsion and without the importunities of insurance agents would the average man who needs it most take out this added insurance to any considerable extent? Could he afford to do so? Probably not more than $2,500 per man on the average would be written. In perfecting the details of the bill Congress may decide to limit the privilege of such subsidized insurance for officers and men whose rates of pay, or private resources, make the Government aid unnecessary. It may also decide to pay the full cost for certain amounts of such added insurance for those who can afford to take only small policies. The principle of the Government subsidy is, however, right and just. There is no discrimination at the expense of the insured taxpayer who pays the full commercial rate in favor of a class to whom we do not owe a greater debt than any subsidized insurance can possible pay.

The cost to the Government, however great and however difficult to estimate exactly in advance, is sure to be less than that of any system of pensions and much fairer because proportionate to what the insured person has done for himself. The soldier who does nothing for himself must be content with what his compensation yields or depend on private charity. After rejecting or neglecting so liberal an opportunity as this provision for the insurance of his insurability offers he can not with good grace appeal to the Government for a pension.

A NEW CHANCE FOR THE INJURED.

An extremely interesting and valuable provision is made for injured persons who may through a process of reeducation, rehabilitation, and vocational training which the Government will provide, have their earning power restored. In cases of dismemberment or of injuries to sight or hearing and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability persons may be required in lieu of compensation for the time being to enlist in a training branch of military and naval service entitling them to full pay as during the last month of their active service and to family allowance and allotments as in the regular service if while taking training for rehabilitation they are prevented from following any substantially gainful occupation. Anyone failing so to enlist for training forfeits his right to compensation until he does so.

A MEASURE DEVISED BY EXPERTS.

Congress has had able assistance in framing its war-insurance act. The plan is in a new and important sense an administration measure. The Secretary of the Treasury very properly considered it a financial measure of the greatest importance and has given it disinterested and able leadership. He called to his assistance not only experts in insurance and the representatives of all the leading insurance companies in this country whose patriotic cooperation he has secured but he has also had the active help and support of influential labor leaders like Mr. Samuel Gompers and Mr. J. W. Sullivan, of socially-minded economists, lawyers, and persons expert in dealing with the problems of dependency, like Judge Julian W. Mack, who has given his time freely as chairman of a committee that drafted the bill and worked out the details of the plan; of Dr. Leo S. Rowe, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Capt. S. H. Wolfe, a well-known accountant and actuary; Miss Julia C. Lathrop, of the Children's Bureau; Mr. V. Everit Macy, president of the National Civic Federation; Profs. Henry R. Seager and Thomas I. Parkinson, of Columbia University, and the staff of the Legislative Drafting Research Fund of Columbia University.

WHAT OTHER COUNTRIES ARE DOING.

The experience of other countries in providing for the dependents of enlisted men has been carefully studied by the Children's Bureau. Much of it has been put in evidence by Miss Lathrop at the House hearings on the bill, many features of which are frankly based on this experience. That of Canada where conditions are more analogous to our own is described by Capt. Wolfe in a publication of the Children's Bureau.

NEED FOR PROMPT ACTION.

Congress should act promptly on the war-insurance measure even though its Members are weary from the arduous labors of a long and momentous extra session. Our laws dealing with problems of dependency in soldiers' families in time of war lack many modern provisions and tendencies which a comparison with those of European countries reveal. It is time that they were modernized. The war-insurance bill will do that and give the United States a measure which will put it in the first rank and ought to be part of the contract between our Government and our new National Army.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition to create a joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war has been pending in both Houses of Congress for several months. A bill for that purpose was introduced in the House by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and in the Senate by Senator WEEKS; and when the food-conservation bill was under consideration in the Senate in July an amendment was offered by Senator OWEN, which passed the Senate, providing for the appointment of such a committee, but limiting its duties to the supervision of expenditures. This proposition that there should be a joint committee of Congress appointed with a view to safeguarding expenditures met with unexpected opposition from a quarter where we might have hoped that it would receive a hearty welcome. It is a proposition too plain for argument and too self-evident for any possible denial that while the first great function of Congress is to see to it that sufficient funds are provided to meet all necessary purposes of the Government, its second greatest function is to see that the money so raised is properly expended.

In order that there may be no doubt as to the exact limitations upon the duties of the proposed joint committee, I will quote the exact language of the amendment:

It shall be the duty of said committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive departments, and it shall be the duty of the executive departments, on request, to keep said committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.

Such committee shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war, with a view to safeguarding expenditures.

This was the proposition and these were its limitations. There was no other provision except that the committee should report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress.

This Congress has already appropriated for the purposes of this war sums of money so vast that they far exceed any appropriations ever made by any Government for any purpose within the same length of time. Enormous as these sums are, they have been appropriated willingly, almost without debate, and they are probably only a beginning. Unless this war shall end sooner than anyone expects it to end, we shall undoubtedly have to appropriate far greater sums in the near future.

But the idea that there shall be any such supervision of expenditures has been most unexpectedly, and up to this time effectively, opposed by the President of the United States. He has said that if such a proposition were enacted into law it would render his task of conducting the war practically impossible. In his letter on the subject, addressed to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], concerning the proposition to create this joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war, the President said:

The constant supervision of executive action which it contemplates would amount to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the executive work of the administration.

There is a very ominous precedent in our history which shows how such a supervision would operate. I refer to the committee on the conduct of the war constituted by the Congress during the administration of Mr. Lincoln. It was the cause of constant distressing harassment and rendered Mr. Lincoln's task all but impossible.

I am not, I beg you to believe, in any way questioning what might be the motives or the purposes of the members of such a committee; I am ready to assume that they would wish to cooperate in the most patriotic spirit, but cooperation of that kind is not practicable in the circumstances.

I sincerely hope that upon the reconsideration of the matter both Houses of Congress will see that my objections rest upon indisputable ground and that I could only interpret the final adoption of section 23 as arising from a lack of confidence in myself.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the Civil War, appointed in 1861, was a committee which supervised not the expenditure of money but the conduct of military campaigns. When it was proposed to create that committee in 1861 Senator Fessenden, of Maine, in a speech reported in the Congressional Globe of December 9, 1861, said:

Now, sir, with reference to this subject many things are to be considered. We are placing a great burden upon the people of this country, or rather the people of this country are placing a great burden upon themselves. They are doing it willingly, cheerfully, resolutely, without a throb except such as we all feel for the good of the country and the attainment of the great objects of the war. Therefore, sir, while such is the feeling, and while we are their agents—because it is in Congress to declare war, and in Congress to provide the means of carrying on war—it behooves us most carefully to look at the course of proceedings relating to the conduct of the war, not in any carping spirit, not with the slightest idea of throwing an obstacle in the way; but with every wish and with every determination to urge it on, and to furnish everything that may be necessary in order to its favorable, happy consummation.

Now, what are we to do? Sit idle during all the period that this war is in progress, be it for a longer or a shorter time? Or are we manfully to do our duty, and when the occasion presents itself in the progress of the war inquire in what manner it is conducted? Sir, I hold the very contrary of the doctrine that we are to leave everything without question, without the slightest complaint, without any inquiry even as to the conduct of this war by the public agents.

Are we not men of some degree of sense and discretion? Are we sent here, chosen men of States, Representatives, the select men of the people in the several districts, without any idea whatever of a correct and proper course of proceeding in relation to this matter?

Sir, we are not under the command of the military of this country. They are under ours as a Congress; and I stand here to maintain it. Say what men may, we are not second; we are first, for we are the representatives of the people, and our behests, so far as they are within the limits of our constitutional authority, are to be obeyed by all.

[Applause.]

I never will consent that I am second and under the control of the military of this country, either in this District or out of it, when I stand here in the discharge of my duty.

I am not disposed to throw any imputation whatever upon anybody for not making an inquiry heretofore. The question is whether we can order it? That is conceded. Whether it will do harm? That I do not believe. I think it is a gentle hint which is necessary at this particular time; that the representatives of the people who are carrying on this war deem it their duty to keep a watchful eye over the proceedings of executive agents, whatever they be called and whatever may be their position.

[Applause.]

I believe there are no better friends of this country, that there are no men more in favor of carrying on this war well and supporting the administration in whatever it does that is right and proper, than those in this Chamber. We are the friends of the Government, and we are the supporters of the war on the part of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, if William Pitt Fessenden were to-day a Member of this House and were supporting the proposition to create to-day a joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the present war, he would not need to change one word or syllable of his clear and convincing argument made 56 years ago.

The members of the Committee on the Conduct of the Civil War as at first appointed were Senators Benjamin F. Wade of Ohio, Zachariah Chandler of Michigan, and Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, and Representatives Daniel W. Gooch of Massachusetts, John Covode of Pennsylvania, George W. Julian of Indiana, and Moses F. Odell of New York. When Andrew Johnson was appointed military governor of Tennessee he resigned his position upon the committee and was succeeded by Senator Joseph A. Wright of Indiana, who served only one year. Upon the expiration of his term the Senate members of the committee in the Thirty-seventh Congress consisted only of Messrs. Wade and Chandler.

President Lincoln and Secretary of War Simon Cameron, as well as Gen. Scott and Gen. McClellan, were undoubtedly opposed at first to the appointment of this committee, but Senator Chandler took prompt and successful measures to assure the President that the committee would be used only to strengthen the hands of the Executive, and promised that it should be made a help and not a hindrance to the vigorous prosecution of the war. In an authoritative article in the Republic Magazine for April, 1875, Hon. James M. Edmunds, who was thoroughly informed as to the events of that period, said:

The writer knows that the administration was not without fear that this was an unfriendly measure. A member of the Cabinet expressed such fears to him, and said that the President had not only expressed doubts as to the wisdom of the movement, but also fears that the committee might by unfriendly action greatly embarrass the Executive. On being told by the writer that the measure was not so intended, but, on the contrary, that it was the intention of the mover to bring the committee to the aid of the administration, he expressed much gratification, and said it was of the utmost importance to bring such purpose to the knowledge of the President in some authoritative way and at the earliest moment possible. This conversation was at once reported to Senator Chandler, whereupon both he and Senator Wade went immediately to the President and the Secretary of War and assured them that it was their purpose to bring the whole power of the committee to the aid of the Executive. From this moment the most cordial relations existed between the committee and the administration.

The committee, in laying out its work, followed the suggestion of Senator Chandler, first, to obtain such information regarding the conduct of the war as would best enable the committee to point out the mistakes which had been made in the past and the course that promised to insure the avoidance of their repetition; second, to collect such information as the many laborious duties of the President and Secretary of War prevented them from obtaining, and to lay it before them with those recommendations and suggestions which the circumstances seemed to demand. The proceedings of the committee were constantly at the command of the President. Almost daily the members of that committee were in consultation with the President or the Secretary of War. Simon Cameron was soon succeeded by Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of War. When President Lincoln sent Stanton's name to the Senate for confirmation, Senator Wade was foremost in moving and supporting immediate confirmation, which was granted without question. Secretary Stanton was frequently present at sessions of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, and there was always the most complete harmony and the utmost confidence between him and the leading members of that committee.

Mr. FOCHT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; although my time is limited.

Mr. FOCHT. Is it not a fact also that Jeremiah Black, of Pennsylvania, Attorney General, and Stanton, Secretary of War, in Lincoln's Cabinet, were both Democrats?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am glad to hear that. They were loyal to the North.

Repeatedly, after the examination of some important witness, Senator Chandler or Senator Wade would go straight to the White House with the clerk of the committee, and the testimony would be read to the President or to the Secretary of War without waiting for it to be written out. From such conferences there sprang many important decisions, and the committee became an extremely important source of knowledge useful both to the White House and the War Department. In the manifold subjects which were offered to the committee for consideration, they unswervingly refused to undertake the investigation of side issues, and kept their attention directed entirely to the essential purposes of the war. Attempts were sometimes made to use the committee to punish enemies or avenge grievances, but its members adhered resolutely to the straightforward course which they had marked out as the path of their duty.

The opening years of the Civil War were filled with delay, defeat, and disappointment for the Union cause. Some of the Union commanders were inefficient and incompetent. No student of Civil War history can dispute or doubt that it was largely because of the untiring efforts of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, and especially of Senator Chandler, that the country was prepared for the removal from high command of incompetent men who had been popularly idolized and support obtained for President Lincoln in his difficult task of supplanting them. Senator Chandler's speech of July 16, 1862, in which he reviewed the entire history of the Civil War from the beginning up to that time, was unquestionably the most important speech of his entire public life. It was the pivot upon which public opinion turned, and it did more than any other one thing to inspire the people of the country with confidence in President Lincoln for the important changes in command which he thereupon made. Again, on March 4, 1864, Senators Chandler and Wade called upon President Lincoln and told him that they believed it to be their duty, impressed as they were with testimony which the committee had taken, to lay before him the evidence so gathered, and in behalf of the Army and the country demand the removal of the commanding general of the Army of the Potomac and the appointment of some one more competent to command it. Within a week Gen. Grant was given command as general in chief, and assumed personal direction of the movements of the Army of the Potomac. Those who have studied the history of the Civil War know well that its success was made possible only by solidifying the divided confidence of the people of the North; and the Committee on the Conduct of the War, dominated as it was by Senators Wade and Chandler, was one of the most powerful agencies in upholding the hands of the President [applause], and through their frequent, friendly conferences with him, and their perfect understanding of what was being done, they were able to speak for the President in Congress and before the country in a convincing way which would otherwise have been impossible. It has been well said of this committee that "The volumes which contain the official record of the proceedings of the Committee on the Conduct of the War are and always must be regarded as the most valuable single magazine of historical material relating to the great Rebellion. They have been liberally used in the preparation of every important account of our civil strife yet published, and the men who shall in the light of another century estimate the greatness and significance of that 'throe of progress' will inevitably look in their pages to the graphic narratives of those who were parts of memorable movements and actors in famous battles as a means of information and to the conclusions of those who prosecuted inquiries so zealously when the events were yet fresh in the memory as a source of guidance. Infallibility is not a human attribute, and the work of this committee was not free from misapprehension and mistake. Time, which has shown some of its errors and will correct others, has also sustained the essential justice of its most important conclusions, which will stand unreversed on the pages of impartial history."

"But the chief value of the labors of this committee is not to be found in its collection of rich materials for the future chronicler. To its unrecorded but potent influence upon the conduct of the war adequate justice has not yet been done. Its unwearied investigations constantly exposed corruption, incompetence, and insubordination, and placed in the hands of the authorities the means of discovering and punishing the knavish, the weak, and the disloyal. Its activity was a perpetual prompter to energy and a vigilant detective by the side of inefficiency and disaffection. As the result of its labors the unsuccessful, the half-hearted, and the traitorous gave way to the able and the patriotic; because of the knowledge of its relentless questioning indolent men were vigilant and laxity was transformed into vigor. Its unremitting labors stayed up the hands of the War Secretary in the heaviest hours of his great task, and usefully informed the counsels and shaped the decisions of the White House. If its every session had been permanently secret, and not a line of its proceedings existed as a public record, there would still remain an ineffaceable transcript of the results of its action in the correcting of mistakes of organization and that crushing of sham generalship which alone made final victory possible."

Mr. Chairman, in Statuary Hall, just beyond yonder door, stands the heroic statue of a man, placed there by the people of a great State, so that future generations may see him as we who knew him remember him, so that those who come after us may know that he was one whom the people of that State delighted to honor. [Applause.] Without doubt, he is the most illustrious of all the men who have yet been sent by that State to represent it in the Congress of the United States. For many years he was a colossal figure in national affairs. Everyone who reads his speeches, preserved in the Congressional Globe and CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, must realize the wisdom, the courage, the personal force and greatness of Zachariah Chandler. [Applause.] The most conspicuous service he rendered during his long career was undoubtedly the work he performed as a member of the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the Civil War. The letter of President Wilson, written to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], misconceiving as it does the indisputable facts in regard to the great service rendered by that committee, of which the great Senator from my State was the most distinguished member, is an unintentional slur upon the memory of that great man. Senator Chandler's fearless performance of duty, his masterly grasp of the task which he performed so well, involving ceaseless labor for four long years, is a shining example which may well be called to the attention of those Members of Congress who may forget that in these tremendous times we, the successors of the men of those days, stand face to face with even greater responsibilities than those which were faced by the men who sat in this Capitol during the great struggle that ended 52 years ago. Shall we shift our burden to Executive shoulders, or shall we, like the brave men of half a century ago, do our share in performing the unprecedented work which lies before us, and see to it that the undreamed-of appropriations of treasure of the greatest Nation in the history of the world are wisely expended, as well as ungrudgingly poured forth?

Mr. Chairman, on April 8, 1913, just after Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated President, he stood at the Clerk's desk of this House and addressed a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, in which he declared it his desire to establish closer and more cooperative relations between Congress and the Executive than had existed in the past. Here are his exact words, taken from page 132 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-third Congress, first session:

Gentlemen of the Congress, I am very glad, indeed, to have this opportunity to address the two Houses directly and to verify for myself the impression that the President of the United States is a person, not a mere department of the Government hailing Congress from some isolated island of jealous power; * * * that he is a human being trying to cooperate with other human beings in a common service. After this pleasant experience, I shall feel quite normal in all our dealings with one another.

At that time the world was at peace, and the most serious task confronting the President was to recommend to Congress a change of tariff policy in order to carry out some pre-election pledges. That was the great purpose for which he wished to be, as he put it, "a human being cooperating with other human beings in a common service." Congress passed practically every law he asked it to pass. If any body of men in the world ever met a man halfway and more than halfway, Congress took Woodrow Wilson at his word and did what he asked them to do.

Since that time a storm of war, more dreadful than anything ever before dreamed of, has been sweeping over the world. A presidential campaign has come and gone. Mr. Wilson was reelected on the claim that "he kept us out of war." Now, he and his Cabinet, chosen for the pursuits and purposes of peace, find themselves confronted with the task of managing for the people of the United States the most colossal enterprise on which this country ever embarked. And the people of the United States, of whom we in this Capitol are the representatives, are asked to make expenditures of money and contributions of our manhood life more stupendous than any man dare predict. Already we have appropriated, at the President's request, billions of money more freely than we would have voted millions five years ago, and already we have enrolled a host of 10,000,000 potential soldiers.

When first he came before us President Wilson said he wished to show us that he was "a human being trying to cooperate with other human beings in a common service."

In this cooperation he has his duties to perform, and just as surely we have ours. Now, following not an "ominous precedent" of half a century ago, but the illustrious example of their wise and able cooperation, is it not our duty to perform a like service? Are there not to be found in the Senate and House of Representatives men who, like the men of those earlier days, will rise to the emergency that confronts us? And if the President of the United States desires to be "a person cooperating in a common service, not a mere department of the Government hailing Congress from some isolated island of jealous power," can he possibly do anything better than to meet us halfway and wholeheartedly in the friendly offer which we have made?

All must admit that Abraham Lincoln was as great a man and as wise a man as ever occupied the seat in the White House; but he was none too great and none too wise to accept the advice and counsel, offered in a friendly manner, by a committee composed of Members of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, owing to the very few minutes allotted to me I shall not attempt to discuss in detail the provisions of the bill providing insurance for men of the Army and Navy, and will say only that I expect to support it as it comes from this committee and am in favor of its general provisions. I support it realizing full well that many fair criticisms have been made of this bill by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and others, but I believe that they will submit amendments correcting some of its defects, that those amendments will be adopted, and I feel it will then be my duty to support it. I am now to make the few remarks I am going to make, which do not touch the bill, by reason of the fact that all of us are receiving a great deal of literature from different organizations and individuals of different States touching upon the conduct of the war. So far as I know up to this time I am among the few Members of this body among the 50 who voted against the entry of the United States into war who has consistently supported the Government in its war measures who has discussed it in any way. You have heard, perhaps, from 1 or 2 or 3 who are continually objecting to something, but you have not heard from the 47 or 48 who have absolutely supported this Government since the time of the enactment of the war act, and it is about time that some of us who have supported the Government should let the people who are sending us this literature know that this body is harmonious and united and that as long as we are here the men who voted against the entry of the United States into war are going to support the Government in every possible way. [Applause.]

Of the 47 of us who take this attitude, you have heard from us only by our consistent support of the conscription act, by our support of the bond act, by our support of the appropriation bills, and you ought to know, in addition to that, that we expect to support the war until the expiration of our term of office.

I am moved to make these remarks because this morning I received in the mail some of this literature from a certain "people's council," or some other body, and it is time some of us who opposed the entry of the United States into this war, answered these treasonable attacks, and did not put it up to you who favored the war to make the reply.

This combination of supposed citizens says that the entente allies can not secure a victory over Germany, even with our aid.

"That the money power wishes the continuation of the war not for victory but for profit and to load the people of the whole world with bonded debt.

"That the entente allies, and particularly England, are working desperately to secure peace while keeping their people convinced that they are victorious.

"That Americans should call on Congress to confine our war with Germany to its legal purpose and to seek peace for America by the settlement of our differences with Germany without reference to other issues.

"That the only possible peace is a peace by compromise.

"That a great part of America's financial and industrial circles are working to continue the war, in opposition to England's efforts for peace; that this country is dominated by the ablest and most powerful of political financiers, Thomas F. Ryan, and that it is not yet certain whether he will fall in with England's wishes or whether he will and can compel a long continuance of the war."

I mention such statements only to call to the attention of the gentlemen who send out literature of that kind, if the density of their skulls will permit me to give them information that that kind of propaganda will have no influence on the people of this country or the Members of this body. [Applause.]

The time for debate ceased with the declaration of war. Before that time we could, and did, disagree. Now we are either for or against the United States. Again these people say:

"An American can not answer to-day the question, 'Why are we at war?' by reference to the latest semiofficial pronouncement, without fearing that by to-morrow a wholly different explanation will be current."

It is useless to argue with any one who continually looks at the past, ignoring the future, but it ought to be plain to any one who loves the United States that it makes no difference what our reasons were for entering the war, whether to protect our rights on the sea or fight for world democracy, the fact remains that we are in it and it is a fight for self-preservation. A fight to keep and preserve the honor, dignity, safety, and life of their country. If a man can fight for nothing else, he ought to fight for that.

This session of Congress is nearly closed, and before it does, I want to send that message to the enemies of the United States not only abroad but at home.

This Congress, no matter how its individual Members voted on the original declaration of war, is going to support the Government to the end and until the United States is victorious.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the consent of the committee in reference to extension of remarks which all had the opportunity of making following the discussion of the food bill. I was not able to avail myself of that on account of illness in my family, and I would like to now ask if I can do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are all in sympathy with the principal objects of this bill. Many of us regret that these objects are sought to be accomplished by a bill that is loaded down with objectionable features which can not meet with our approval.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAIG], who is an authority on military matters, and of good judgment, I think, gave a satisfactory explanation of why this provision in regard to allotments of the pay of enlisted men should be made, namely, that the men would be better off if they did not have so much money to spend—that is, the vast majority, at least. I was glad to hear him say that, because I believe that we will do the men a great service by adopting some such provision.

The next provision of the bill is entitled "compensation" and is said to be a substitute for pension laws. I find in the supplemental report the reason for this is that pensions, especially since the day of the service-pension legislation, have come to be looked upon as Government charity, and the present pension legislation is both inadequate and unfair. Now, I do not propose to let a statement of that kind go unchallenged. It embodies a reflection upon every brave soldier that has served his country from the time of the Revolution down to the present time. I know that there are Members of this House representing a certain section of the country who have for so long derided the pension laws of this Government that they have convinced themselves that those laws are all wrong and unjust, and they have created the general impression throughout the country that that is the case. Their reason for so doing was largely the fact that none of the pensions happened to be distributed among their constituents, for reasons that we all know. But that is a forced and stilted argument. To say that the pension laws as now administered constitute a charity is a libel upon the character of the services of brave men who have established and founded this Government and defended it all the time since its foundation. [Applause.]

So far as the administration of these laws is concerned, through the Bureau of Pensions, everybody knows that they have been, no matter what administration has been in power, perfectly fair and just and judicial. So far as the general laws have been inadequate to meet special cases, the relief granted by Congress during the 15 years of my service here has generally, as a rule, been fair and just. Now, these men who so flippantly in this report denounce the pension laws evidently wrote that without thinking what a reflection it was upon the brave men and women who are receiving pensions to-day. And they seek to establish an invidious distinction between those soldiers of past wars and their dependents and those who are to come hereafter under this law, because they say that it is not a charity now but that it is going to be compensation.

The gentleman who reported the bill was very particular that he wanted everybody to know it was compensation. The first thing that strikes the mind in reading that provision is that it is unfair. That provision is not a democratic but an aristocratic measure. It is a measure that is framed in the interest of officers and not in the interest of the private soldier, who does the fighting. A maximum of $40 for total disability, they say, is not a pension, is not a charity like pensions are now, but is compensation. Compensation, mind you! The man who has lost his eyesight or is totally paralyzed and disabled is compensated, in the view of this committee, for his sufferings through life and his inability to earn his livelihood by $40 or $50 a month. Shame on you! I have sat at the same table in a hotel in this city with a man who lost his leg on one of the battle fields of the Civil War, and I know that for years that man suffered agonies that were indescribable. He was drawing a pension very much larger than provided here, but would anybody have the audacity to say that that was compensation for his suffering through life?

Who is it that has invented this term? They say they have borrowed it from workmen's compensation laws and want to apply that analogy to the pension laws. The pension laws, my dear friends, were not framed upon any such theory at all. The pensioners of the United States who rendered military service are not the subjects of charity or compensation. They did not serve in order that they might get compensation. They served because they loved that flag and risked their lives for their country and its institutions; and what we do for them is not compensation.

If, in saving the country and establishing liberty in the world, they lost the ability to make a living, is it not the duty of the Government, is it not the glad duty of the free people of the United States to supply their wants? Do they do that in this compensation? No. Why do they do it? Because those men, on account of their service, rendered from high and patriotic motives, are unable to earn their living and care for themselves it is the duty of the American people to do so. [Applause.]

That is the reason. Shame upon the argument that comes here in a written document and charges that every pensioner of the United States is in receipt of charity!

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not want to make a question. I do not want to ask a question. I want to make a correction. The report does not say any such thing. It says they are about in the attitude of—

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I read it from the report on page 2. You will find it there. Here it is:

Pensions, especially since the day of service-pension legislation, have come to be looked upon as Government charity, and the present pension legislation is both inadequate and unjust. It is of the utmost importance, both for the practical results and for the psychological effect upon the men, their families, and the people of the country, that a new point of view be established. This is accomplished by following the analogy of the workmen's compensation acts, by designating the payments to them as compensation and not as pensions, and by separating the administration of this law absolutely and completely from the administration of the pension laws. The pension legislation is not repealed; the old soldiers and their families are not affected by the bill; it applies only to those now in or hereafter entering the service. For them this bill is a substitute for the pensions and gratuities.

The first objection, outside of the language of the report, is that it is unfair and unjust, because it is based upon aristocratic lines giving the officer many, many times more for injuries than is given to the soldier. That is not in harmony with the present pension laws; that for total disability, such as blindness and loss of both legs, $100 is the maximum, whether a man was a laborer in an Engineer troop and rendered hard manual labor or was an officer in command, because the suffering or lack of ability to earn a living is taken away from him by reason of his service to his country.

Another thing: The widows are treated in the same disproportionate way. Under the existing law they get $12 and $20; widows of officers and men alike. Here the widows may get as high as $200 a month.

Then we come to the last paragraph, which they call "insurance." That is a misnomer. Why? Because insurance is a contract to indemnify one in consideration of a premium paid. Is this insurance? They say it is. Some say seven-eighths and some say nine-tenths of the risk is not paid for. In the hearings they go on and show that perhaps 25 per cent and possibly 50 per cent at the highest of the soldiers will avail themselves of this opportunity to be insured.

In my opinion there would not be over 20 per cent, or one-fifth that would be insured, and they would mostly be the officers. Those are the men who would be insured. They are not included in the allotment provision, but they are included in this insurance provision. The officers have foresight and business ability enough to see the advantage of getting $10 worth of insurance by paying for $1, and consequently they get $10,000. Some of the actuaries have estimated that it is only half paid then.

Now, what is the result? You have in this new army of a million men at least 50,000 officers. If you count the noncommissioned officers, you will have more. These thousands of officers will constitute more than one-half of those insured.

You say that you give this insurance for a premium, but you give nine-tenths of it for what? Not a gratuity. The best logic would indicate that you gave these men nine-tenths of that insurance for their services, for their military service and the risks and sacrifices. How about the 80 per cent or the 75 per cent that do not take out policies? All of them, we may assume, are private soldiers. Will they not have rendered services, military services, equal to those insured? They gave you therefore nine-tenths of the premium, and you gave them nothing, because they did not have the foresight and business ability to take out the policy and pay the one-tenth.

When I say that this does not pay one-tenth of the premium, I want to call your attention to another point in the bill. The bill says that it shall be insurance against death and total disability, and it says that the rate after the war shall be determined by the American Experience Table of Mortality. I wonder if the man who wrote that knew what he was about? [Laughter.] The American Experience Table of Mortality for what? For disability, because you say in your bill that you insure against disability as well as against death. Look at your experience table; look at the so-called American Table of Mortality. There are a half dozen or a dozen tables, the experience tables of life insurance companies, but they cover only death. They do not cover disability. You can not get experience for disability by consulting mortality tables any more than you can get the laws of the United States by looking into a dictionary. And yet here we have it. That is the basis on which you say you are going to calculate the premium.

Now, I carry an accident policy of $5,000. I pay $50 a year. But that only covers accidental injury. If I slip or fall on the street by accident, I get compensation. But if I contract rheumatism, and if my shoe hurts me and infection sets in and I lose my foot, that is not accidental means. I have not paid for that. That would require an additional premium. And sickness is a total disability, and presumably under this bill perhaps it would be covered. But you have not paid any premium for it.

Suppose a soldier was sent away, and he was gone only a few months and came back on a stretcher, totally disabled by inflammatory rheumatism. He would be insured under this bill. He would not be paid for any such risk as that under a life insurance policy. Are you going to grant indemnity under this insurance clause for that? Yes; if the disability was incurred in line of duty. So you see, the proposed insurance covers a risk not embraced in a life policy at all. It is an additional risk not included in the calculated premium you have applied. Here we have therefore a case where one man pays nine-tenths, if not nineteen-twentieths as much in service, in risking his life for his country as the other man, one getting $5,000 or $10,000 insurance for disability or death and the other nothing. That is because he failed to pay the one-twentieth in cash. He paid nineteen-twentieths in services, the same as the other did. It is the most unjust and unfair proposition that has ever been proposed in any bill. Mr. Ekern, the insurance commissioner of Wisconsin, saw this, so in the hearings he proposed that all the men should be insured at $4,000 without charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I should like two minutes more.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will speak of the first section last. Here is a proposition to hitch on to an insurance bill in the Treasury Department, that they said was only a temporary affair, all the functions of the Pension Office with its experience and its thousands of employees. What can be the motive, except to create offices? What can we say of men who are seeking by this indirect legislation to establish useless offices at the expense of the Government when we already have an established Bureau of Pensions better able to administer these laws? [Applause.] In all the hearings you have not been able to show a single expert in pension affairs. You have taken philanthropists, God bless them, accident insurance and life insurance actuaries. You have not consulted the men that know about pensions. You have not brought to your mind the fact that you are creating a discrepancy between the existing pension laws and the proposed law, that will flood Congress with special legislation. Do you suppose the widows of officers here in Washington who are getting only $20 a month are going to allow their fellow officers' widows or dependents to draw $200 a month? The widows of generals would draw that, and we have more generals now than they used to have captains two or three years ago. The result will be that instead of this bill, as the report says, doing away with special legislation, it will flood Congress with thousands and thousands of appeals to help out those cases that have a good basis in equity and justice, if we believe in democratic institutions and the equal treatment of all. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have but very few words to say in regard to the measure which the committee is now considering. I have always been a believer in compensation for workmen. I was a member of the Legislature of the State of Ohio when the first workmen's compensation law was passed in that State. I was very glad to have the opportunity to support that bill. At that time it was opposed very strongly by the insurance companies of our State and other States of the Union. They maintained that it would not be successful; that it would not work to the interest of the working classes of the people; but in the few years since that law has been in operation I want to say that it has been of the greatest benefit to the working classes of our State. I believe in the compensation feature of this measure. I believe that we ought to compensate our soldiers who go to the firing line in France, and we ought also to be ready and willing to take care of those who are dependent upon them who have to stay at home. I shall support the compensation feature of this bill.

But what I rose at this time to say was a few words in regard to the present draft system. I was a consistent supporter of the draft measure all the way through. I believe in it, and I believe it is the only fair, just, and the best way to raise an army. I want especially to mention the situation concerning the city in which I live, which is a part of my district, the city of Youngstown, Ohio. The quota on the draft for the city of Youngstown, Ohio, is 1,793, but in addition it has furnished hundreds of volunteers for the National Guard, 75 men for the officers' camps, and the complete personnel and equipment for a base hospital unit. Its subscriptions to the liberty loan and Red Cross fund exceeded those of cities many times its size; and I might say that the city of Youngstown was the third city in the United States in the subscription to the Red Cross fund per capita. I desire to read from an article published in one of our daily papers:

"The War Department's distribution sheet shows that Youngstown is sending more men to war under the draft than such cities as Denver, Atlanta, Birmingham, Louisville, Providence, Omaha, Worcester, and Kansas City. It is sending more than the entire States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Delaware, Nevada, and Wyoming, and about as many as the entire State of Maine.

"The estimated population of Youngstown on January 1 of this year was 125,000. This city's draft quota of 1,793 compares with 967 for Columbus, with a population of 210,000. Providence, R. I., with 251,000 people, is to furnish 569. Kansas City, Mo., is called upon for 814, which is about what the first district of Youngstown will send. Springfield, Mass., with 110,000, will give 584, and Tacoma, Wash., with about the same population, only 207.

"These and other figures are contained in the following tables, showing some of the large cities of the country, a dozen States, their estimated population January 1, 1917, and the draft quotas required of them:

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman understand why this discrepancy happens?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I was just coming to that.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman about that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I want it understood that the city of Youngstown is patriotic. The people of that city do not intend to shirk their duty in any way, shape, or form. Their past actions show that in very clear terms. I wrote to the Secretary of War asking him why the city of Youngstown had to furnish more men than some of the States of the Union, and than cities of twice the population. I believe he referred that letter to Gen. Crowder, who answered that the quota was based on the total number of registrations in each community. The number of registrations in the city of Youngstown was 25,000, but 10,000 of those registered were aliens who were not subject to service under the Government of the United States in any way. I maintain that it is unfair to ask the young men of the city of Youngstown, that great industrial center, with the second largest iron and steel industry in the world—I maintain that it is unfair for the War Department to base the draft quota on a registration including 10,000 aliens who are not subject to service in this crisis. We have a class of young men who are skilled mechanics, a very high class of men. With this draft taking, as it does, 1,793 of our young men, when we have already furnished over 1,200 volunteers, and a full unit and equipment of a base hospital, it seems to me that the War Department ought to provide some means whereby the quota of young men in an industrial center like this will not be based on the registration of the alien population. I want to call the attention of the House to this, because if we are going to base the quota under the draft system upon that alien population, I think Congress had better get busy at once and do something that will require these aliens, who stay at home and take the places of our fine young Americans in our industries, to bear their share of the burden and danger.

When the time comes to call the next draft quota this inequality must be adjusted, either by calling the aliens into some kind of service or by excluding the alien registration in determining the quota. In the next call Youngstown and other industrial centers must be credited with the large number of young men called in the first draft, and this credit deducted from the second draft. The number called in the next draft would then be relatively small.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the consideration of the bill which has the wide scope and great importance that this bill certainly has, I do not wonder that there is room for criticism and perhaps adverse comment. No great measure, presented to the Congress, can be entirely satisfactory, even to those who are the framers thereof; and if it is not entirely satisfactory to those who have drawn the bill and supported the measure, how much truer is it that those who are hostile to the measure find room for adverse criticism. In my limited experience in legislative matters, and in a somewhat wider experience in business and legal matters, I have found this to be an axiom, that some people seem to be constituted with a destructive genius and not a constructive genius. In other words, it might be paraphrased by saying that it is very much easier to tear down a house than it is to build that same house. And so applying that example to this bill it can be truthfully said that it is very much easier to criticize this measure than it was to frame it.

Now, this whole bill, according to my humble judgment, is framed with one purpose in view, and that is to help to win this war, and then to help those, as best we may, who help in the winning of that war. In other words, the slogan ought to be, "Win the war, and at the same time help those who are helping to win that war." [Applause.]

Therefore it strikes me that another phase of this matter ought to be taken into consideration—the greatest good to the greatest number. I have heard several of the distinguished gentlemen on the floor criticize this bill because it was in conflict with the pension laws; that it was in contradiction thereof. Now, that is far from the truth. If the gentlemen who make that criticism are honestly engaged in a study of this bill and peruse it carefully, they will find, as a matter of fact, that it does not in any way affect the present pension laws. Those who are pensioners to-day under existing laws remain pensioners, and this bill applies only to those who are engaged in the service of the United States either in the Army or the Navy or as nurses in the present war.

Therefore it can be taken as a prime factor that this bill applies only to a specific class.

I have heard one gentleman, who is chairman of the Pension Committee, and for whose opinion I have the greatest respect, criticize this bill because it provides that a bachelor soldier who is totally disabled, either by the loss of both eyes or the loss of two limbs, receives only $40. Now, that gentleman certainly does not mean that if he knows what the bill contains. The bill says that if he be a bachelor he shall receive $40. That is true. But it is also provided that he shall have $20 for a nurse, which makes $60. It also provided that by reason of total disability he can take out insurance which guarantees him $25 a month, which makes $85 a month.

I grant you, for the sake of argument, that the fact is that the totally disabled man under the pension laws received $100 a month by reason of the loss of two limbs or the loss of two eyes. But he is a bachelor, and taking into consideration that the bill is framed not for the individual, if you please, but framed for the benefit of the family, considering the family as a unit, we must remember the other fact that this bill is framed for the greatest good to the greatest number.

Now, what happens, provided the man has a family? If that man has a family, he receives $10 in addition for the widowed mother, if the widow mother is dependent upon him, and he receives so much for each child and so much for his wife. Therefore, if the matter is averaged, according to the laws of average, while it seems that in a single case of total disability there may be disadvantage to the soldier who under the old pension laws receives the sum of $100 a month, if the matter is boiled down to a residuum, this bill shows that it does the greatest good to the greatest number because it makes the family the unit. If I was not convinced by a thorough inspection of the bill, and by an analysis of it, that it did a greater good than the existing pension laws I would be against the bill.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. I certainly will.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman whether in his judgment the provisions of this bill, if it becomes a law, will place the surviving soldiers of this war in a better condition than are the surviving soldiers of former wars and whether it will place the widow of soldiers killed in this war in better position than the widows of soldiers whose lives were lost in former wars?

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman's question is pertinent. In other words, as we lawyers say, it is very material and relevant and not impertinent. The gentleman's suggestion is true; it places the enlisted man or the officer who is engaged in the service of this country, who is killed or wounded in the battle, in a better position than the man who served in the Civil War or the Mexican War or the Spanish War. It places the widows of these soldiers of this war in a better position than the widows of soldiers of the Civil War or other wars, and I am frank to say in my judgment—

Mr. DENISON. That being true, does not the gentleman think that dissatisfaction will arise and that we will have in the immediate future appeals to alter the present laws so as to make them uniform?

Mr. DEWALT. I am frank to say that that will be the result unless the bill can be amended in such a way as to remedy what I concede to be an unfortunate distinction between the two classes.

I might illustrate in this way: The widow of a deceased soldier in the late war gets $12 a month. Under this bill the widow of a soldier of the present war would receive considerable more, and therefore there naturally would be some dissatisfaction on the part of the pensioners of the Spanish War and of the Civil War against provisions of this bill; but these would be legislative questions for amendment in the existing pension laws.

Permit me to say this: Any great measure, whether it be one thing or another, must have a start somewhere, and no legislature at any one time can complete the thing as it should be without being subject to amendment from time to time.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under this law the widow must be the widow by a marriage contracted before the injury occurred.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Whereas under the existing pension laws the widows of many were married long after the Civil War and are enjoying now the benefits of the pension.

Mr. DEWALT. That is true, and is in part an answer to what the gentleman has said. Nevertheless, I say frankly as a member of this committee that this bill is subject to the criticism that the gentleman has just made, and it is subject to the criticism made by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and for that very reason, as I was about to observe when the gentleman interrupted me, this bill in its entire purpose is framed for the benefit of the greatest good to the greatest number, and when we speak of the greatest number we speak not only of the individual soldier but of the units which consist of his children and his wife. Now, what are the distinguishing features of this bill?

I regret very much, gentlemen of the committee, that in the limited time I have I will not be able to discuss what I believe to be the essential features of the bill. My time is limited, and I do not want to trespass upon the good humor and kindness of the committee nor of the gentleman who has charge of the bill. But if this bill be analyzed it can be divided into five different portions. First, the allotment feature, which is the allotment by the individual soldier. Second, the allotment feature which is the allotment given by the Government which is commensurate with the allotment as given by the soldier. Third, the payment to the men who are the enlisted men or officers the payment to them by reason of disability occasioned during the war or by wounds in the war, and this disability includes not only injury but it includes physical disability occasioned by illness during service in line of duty.

The next feature of this bill, and in my judgment one of the important parts of this bill, is the compensation feature. I have heard gentlemen say upon the floor of this House that this is compensation or pension. Call it what you please, name that child by any name by which you may baptize it, nevertheless it remains this: It is a benefice given to the soldier. I care not whether you call it pension—the old adage is that a rose would smell as sweet by any other name—the fact remains that it is not a gratuity, but it is a benefice, a matter of welfare given to the man who is willing to sacrifice his life for the preservation of his country. Now, what is that benefice? It is compensation, properly termed compensation, under compensation laws. Now, what is compensation? Compensation means payment; and payment how? Payment in full for the advantages given. In other words, when we have a contract between two individuals, one grants this in consideration of the fact that the other pays that, and the compensation in this instance means that the party affected by this contract shall be paid. Now, what is the contract? The contract here, my friends, is just this: That A is an enlisted man, we will say under the volunteer system. He freely, of his own accord, goes into the Army. His contract is that he will serve the Government of the United States even unto the death if so required. That is his portion of the contract. The contract of the Government is that he will be paid for his services. How? That he will be paid, if in foreign service, $30 a month with an additional $3 per month because he is on a foreign shore.

I say to you, in my judgment, the payment is entirely inadequate. The man who voluntarily goes into the Army of the United States or into the Navy thereof, taking the chances of losing his life and the possibility of leaving a family at home uncared for, should be paid more than $33 per month; but the Government of the United States and the Congress thereof has legislated and fixed that pay, and now we propose to do—what? We do propose to say that this soldier shall not wait until the termination of this war and then apply for a pension. We do not say that he shall wait until five years have expired, if you please—if the war lasts that long—and then submit his claim to a pension committee; but by this bill and the provisions thereof we say, We will make a contract with you now. What is the contract? We will pay you $33 a month and we will compensate you fully for any injury that may happen to you during that war and sign that contract before you go to war. Now, that is a bald, plain proposition. You may say that infringes upon the pension laws. I care not whether it does or does not. I maintain it does not. It has absolutely nothing to do with the present pension laws. What I do maintain is this, that we are making a bond with the soldier and the sailor, as well as the female and male nurses who go into this service, and that bond says we will pay you, but we will not pay you in five years from this time but will pay you now whenever injury occurs or disability arises. Now, what is the compensation? Some gentlemen say the compensation is less than it would be under the pension laws. I grant you that is so in some instances.

I have here and would be glad, if I had time, to submit to the membership of this committee the amount that is paid for certain disabilities which under the law are recognized as being total disabilities; also the amount that is paid under the present pension laws for partial disability. By an analysis of that table, which is furnished in the supplement to the report of the committee, and which is dated August 24, and which is compiled by the chairman of the Pensions Committee, I say that, by an analysis of that, there is not a fair-minded man upon this committee who will not come to the conclusion that in the aggregate—mark the word—in the aggregate and on the average the provisions of this proposed bill and this legislation as now before this committee are more beneficial and more generous to the soldier than the pension laws that we have now upon our statute books.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly, and I am glad to do so with grace to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I want to ask for a little information. This bill is so involved that I declare I can not figure out half what is in it, although I have looked it over for two or three weeks. Now, on page 20, line 13, it says:

The maximum monthly compensation for total disability shall be $200.

Now, then, turn back to page 19, line 17—

(1) If and while the disability is total so as to make it impracticable for the injured person to pursue any gainful occupation, the monthly compensation shall be the following percentages of his pay:

(a) If he has neither wife nor child living, 40 per cent, but not less than $40.

Now, granting that he was a married man and would get all of these percentages, he would not come any ways near $200.

Now, what is that $200 compensation for total disability put in there for?

Mr. DEWALT. For the very best reason in the world.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Is that for an officer?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly. The very best reason in the world. And it is surprising to me that the gentleman, with his acumen in regard to pensions, did not discover that without inquiry. Take a major general, whose salary is $8,000 or $10,000 a year—I do not know what it is, because I have never occupied the rank—but, whatever his salary may be, it is a high one. By an allotment he might be able to be allotted a great deal and might receive a great sum of money, but this bill provides that whatever his rank be, whether major, colonel, major general, or lieutenant general, he could not receive beyond the maximum of $200.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The point I was making was that under existing law any man, whether he be a private or whether he be a major general, if he receives a total disability, for example, the loss of both eyes or the loss of both arms or the loss of both legs, will receive $100 per month.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. As far as I am concerned—

Mr. LOBECK. Is that whether he is single or married?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Single or married. It does not make any difference.

Mr. LOBECK. A neighbor boy of mine lost both of his legs in the service last June. He is 17 years of age, is not married, and Mr. ALEXANDER told me that he would only get $40 a month under this bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I am talking about the existing law. I am not talking about this proposed law.

Mr. LOBECK. You were referring to this proposed law, and that is why I spoke of it.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I said under existing law, and not the proposed law. If a soldier should lose both eyes or both legs or both arms, he would receive $100 a month, regardless of whether he was a major general or a private.

Mr. LOBECK. That is true of a Civil War private whom I know, who lives here at the Capital.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I am in favor of the boy who goes down into the trenches and faces the guns getting just as much as a major general if he loses both arms or both eyes or both legs.

Mr. LOBECK. You figure his life is just as precious to his loved ones as that of a major general?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Exactly. When you go back home and these boys return from France you are going to have political indigestion when these questions are put to you, if you vote for this proposition.

Mr. LOBECK. And it will be a serious question to answer. I do not know how one can explain.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think anybody disagrees with my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, in regard to his patriotism, and I think everybody will voice the same sentiment, namely, that the life of a major general is no more precious to him or to his people than the life of a private soldier. But that is not the meat of this proposition. The meat of this proposition is, What is the best thing to do under the existing circumstances, not for the individual but for all the people concerned, at this time? In other words, whilst my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who seems to be entirely imbued with the idea that the individual shall profit, I for myself take the larger view of this proposition, and say that not only he should profit but all his dependents and his entire family should profit. And that is why the insurance feature and the compensation feature are placed in this bill.

I grant you, my friend, that if it were not for this insurance feature and if it were not for this compensation feature in this bill, your criticism would be entirely correct. And I grant you that in some individual instances, which you have been careful enough to reiterate to this House, and time and time again, and for which you are not to be blamed—for instance, where there is total disability for the loss of both eyes, or both legs, or both arms, that in that particular instance it works hardship. Nevertheless, when you consider the proposition from its four corners, as you must construe a will not by the individual phrases thereof, but from the four corners of the will and take it all together; when you take this bill as an entirety, I submit as a bald proposition, capable of proof by the figures that you have submitted yourself, that it is a more generous bill to the people who are apt to enlist and who will be drafted into the present Army than the bill that is now on the statute books in regard to pensions.

Mr. LOBECK. The bill that is now in force, the present law, has been advanced in amount from what it was originally when passed, because the widows originally got only $6 and the soldier got $6 and $8. But by this Congress it has been increased.

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, yes. The laws of 1897 and 1899 have increased the widows' pension and the other pensions. And I maintain and every right-minded man must maintain that we can not do too much for the widows and orphans and dependents of those who are willing to go into the service of the United States. But, nevertheless, there must be justice done to all; and that is what, in my judgment, this bill is trying to do.

Now, there has been some question as to what this matter is based upon. Permit me in a very brief way to refer to tables of estimates which were made in regard to this very compensation feature. It is estimated that the men in the active service for the first year will be 350,000; that the total disabled, at the rate of 50 per 1,000, will be 17,500; that the totally disabled with dependents, 40 per cent, will be 7,000; the totally disabled without dependents, 60 per cent, 10,500; making a total, disabled with dependents, 7,000; for allowance, one-half of $800 per man, $400, $2,800,000.

In other words, the estimated expense there for this compensation feature of this bill for the first year is $5,250,000. For the second year it is considered to be $35,000,000.

Now, this is compensation to whom? Compensation to the man who has made the contract with the Government that he will give the Government his services. Now, my friends, there is one matter of particular importance that strikes me in this discussion, and that is this: This compensation feature is not a new feature in the history of legislation. We have to-day upon the statute books a Federal compensation law in regard to injuries which may occur to the very people who are employed here in the Capitol Building. Your elevator man, for instance, considered to be a Federal employee, or the man who works in the Post Office Department down on Pennsylvania Avenue, or the lady who is an attendant there, is a Federal employee and, by virtue of the provisions of the compensation act known as the Federal Compensation act, he or she can be compensated for injuries. They are in civil life, rendering civic duty to the Government.

I ask you, in the name of common sense, if you have been wise enough and generous enough to place upon the statute books of this Nation a law which compensates these people, why should you not put on the statute books a law compensating the soldier who goes to the front and is willing to sacrifice his life for his country? You have insured seamen. You have compelled the masters of vessels, by a bill coming from our committee, to insure the men engaged in the marine service of this country. You have also compelled them to insure their cargoes. In other words, by your legislation, in the very recent past, you have said that the goods of the individual shall be insured; you have said that the men engaged in the performance of civic duties upon vessels must be insured as seamen; and now you criticize, some of you, the very fact that we are asking you to insure the lives of these men who are going to the front to fight your battles. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I will ask the gentleman for additional time by reason of the interruptions.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. DEWALT. I think I shall be able to tire the House and tire myself in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, this compensation feature, as I was saying just a moment ago, is not a matter of recent date. There are very few States in the Union to-day that do not have compensation laws. I might refer specifically to the State of Pennsylvania. We there have a choice as between the compensation law and the privilege of the injured party to sue in the courts of law and recover his judgment before a jury.

Now, what has been the history of the working out of that compensation law? The history is that in 90 per cent of the cases—and I speak by a tabulated reference—in 90 per cent of the cases the injured parties have taken what they could obtain under the compensation laws of Pennsylvania, rather than to go to a jury and have their cases tried there. Why? Because the working people of the State of Pennsylvania have recognized, by the experience of a few years, that that compensation law is a just and equitable law and that it gives them what they are fairly entitled to and gives it to them when? Why, it gives it to them when they are injured. And it gives it to them how? By a decision of the party that has the matter in charge, to wit, the Labor Bureau of the State of Pennsylvania, without litigation and without the right of appeal.

Now, that is what I am arguing for here. This compensation feature of this bill is based upon the tabulated compensation laws of the various States of the Union. Mr. Gompers, the head of the American Federation of Labor, who favors this legislation and who appeared before our committee, stated that in every State of the Union where they had compensation laws, with the exception of two States, it was the uniform practice that the injured parties resorted to the compensation features of the law, even though they had the right of having their cases tried before a jury.

Now, this bill and the features thereof in regard to compensation—and I wish I had the privilege and the time to explain these matters seriatim and show you how fair they are—this bill provides in substance that every man who is disabled during the war shall be entitled either by reason of total disability or partial disability to compensation for that injury. When? Not five years after the war is closed, by appealing to the Pension Bureau or by going to Congress and asking for a special bill, but so instant, as the lawyers would say in Latin—and I beg pardon for quoting Latin. I do not know whether it is good Latin at that. But the law says you shall be compensated for your injury; if it be total, so much; if it be partial, so much. And, more than that, this compensation is without appeal and without trial before a jury, and without resort to any of the technicalities of the law.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I presume he was present at the hearings?

Mr. DEWALT. Not as frequently as I should have been, I regret to say.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I want to ask the gentleman what was the object of the committee and what could have been the object of the parties framing this bill to permit, or to allow, or to put into this bill the statute of limitations running against these pensioners?

Mr. DEWALT. I notice that is one of the criticisms you make in your report, and you say that the Government of the United States should not close its doors against the parties that have been injured or disabled, and that we should have the doors left wide open for time immemorial in which to permit them to present their claims. I beg leave to differ with you. I beg leave to hold that the man has the right to present his claim in reasonable time. The law was not framed for the negligent; the law was framed for the provident man. Every man is presumed to know the law, and if a man sleeps upon his rights, whether he is a soldier or a private citizen, and negligently refuses to avail himself of his opportunity, or neglects to present his claim, I think the Government of the United States has the right to say, "Your claim is void because you have not been wise enough to pursue it." That is my contention.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Let me assume this kind of a case: For instance, a young soldier comes back from France. He has sustained the loss of his left arm. He can earn a livelihood. He does not make application immediately upon his return.

Mr. DEWALT. He does not have to. He has two years' time in which to do so.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Then after a time he meets with reverses in a business way, and after three or four years he finds that a little help from the Government is necessary. But the doors are shut to this young man and he can not get any pension. Why should the Government deny to that young man a pension just because he did not make application within the two years? Why should the door be forever shut to him and he denied the right to make an application? Bearing in mind that this young man having sustained an injury—there is a record of it in the War Department, a hospital record and a military record—and as long as that record exists in the War Department, why should he not be permitted at any time to come in and prove that disability and get a pension?

Mr. DEWALT. I will take your premises just as you have stated them and then will see what conclusion we come to. Your premise is that the young man is injured in the line of his service. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. That he comes back after his discharge and that he still has that injury. That is a portion of your premise, is it not?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. That for a period of two years, either through negligence or a disinclination so to do, he refuses to make his claim. That is a portion of your premise, is it not?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Then, subsequently he changes his mind, or by reason of straitened circumstances he desires to make his application, and he can not. Is that your premise?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; he is barred.

Mr. DEWALT. If you can find any instance of that kind, it will be the most remarkable instance in the history of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Oh, no; I take issue with the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. I have a case just now of a man who refused a pension and turned it back because he did not need it at the time. Now he has asked to be reinstated, and the Government is charitable enough to let him go back on the pension roll.

Mr. DEWALT. I grant you that in an instance of that kind, where a man has been upon the pension roll, or possibly has refused to accept a pension when he was entitled thereto, there still remains the chance under this bill of his being a provident man in his day and generation, and it gives him two years' time in which to determine what he will do. Now, I take it as a matter of sound legal basis, what I have said is eminently correct, that the law is not made for the improvident—and the law is also not made for the negligent. The law is made for the reasonable man, who is presumed to know the law and to observe the same, and somewhere there should be a limit fixed, by which time should be of the essence of the contract, if you please, and I take it as a primal fact that if the injured party has had two years' time, the injury having been sustained during the service in the line of duty, he should present his claim within two years.

Mr. DENISON. In that connection is it not true that all compensation laws have a period of limitation?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, they all do. Now, there is another feature to which I desire to refer, and then I shall conclude.

It is said that this compensation feature is unjust, because it makes a discrimination against the private in favor of the officer. Is that true? No; it is not. Apparently it does; but when you reason it out to its conclusion it does not. Why? Because the earning capacity of every man must be taken into consideration when you consider the compensation feature in the law. In other words, in fixing compensation under all the statutes in all the States there is always taken into consideration as a primal fact—first, the age of the individual; second, the number of people that he has dependent upon him; and third, the earning capacity which he has in order to sustain himself and the people dependent upon him. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I am exceedingly sorry that I can not go on.

Mr. ESCH. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to attack or discuss that part of this bill which seeks to provide financial assistance for dependent relatives of soldiers and sailors while in the service during this war, or that which would afford life insurance to these soldiers and sailors at the lowest cost consistent with safety in such a venture. Much can be said in support of both provisions and in some form I believe both wise and just, particularly in the matter of assistance to dependent relatives.

I do wish to discuss the pension part of the bill—and it is pensions and nothing else which is provided for in article 3 of the bill. It is true it is called "compensation"; but it provides for monthly payments of money where disabilities or death result from injuries, wounds, or diseases incurred or contracted in service. What is that, pray, but a pension?

The pension part of this bill is long and most involved and obscure. The remarkable report submitted by the committee is very brief and affords no help in understanding the bill it is presumed to support. In fact, the bill and the report remind me of an old story:

A young graduate from a theological college chose for his text in his first effort one of the most involved and mystic in the Bible. He floundered about for half an hour or so in his sermon. After the services he asked an old and wise man of his congregation what he thought of his sermon.

"Remarkable, very remarkable," was the reply.

"In what respect, please?" inquired the young minister.

"Well, if your text had the smallpox, your sermon would never have caught it, sir."

If this bill had virulent smallpox, even the most timid would not suggest the need to vaccinate the report. [Laughter.]

However, thanks to Mr. PARKER, a most excellent minority report has been submitted. I hope that every Member has read or will read this minority report. It is not long; but it is plain and simple and gives as clear an insight into just what this most involved and vague bill will provide should it become a law as it is humanly possible for one to give. It does that which neither the bill nor the committee does—it reduces the provisions of the bill to actual figures as to its pension rates.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has read both of the majority reports on this bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Oh, yes; I have read both reports. I hope that every Member has read or will read the minority report of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The report of Mr. Parker clearly and beyond any cavil shows that the third article of this bill simply changes the present pension rates. It raises some vastly, reduces others, will doubtless not affect some, and abolishes some now existing.

In my letter to Judge ADAMSON, published as part of the hearings on this bill, I set forth how unwise, unnecessary, and at what great expense it would put the Government to take from the Pension Bureau, with its trained force, who by their experience, information, and skill in such matters could easily and properly handle with equal fairness to claimant and to the Government any claim which could grow out of this war, the matter of pensions, and give same to a new force in a new bureau, which, of course, would be without knowledge and experience in the questions of pension claims. Mr. PARKER in his report sustains me in this contention.

Right here, permit me to state that the bill simply authorizes the creation of such a bureau—a force of clerks. There is no provision in the bill or statement in the committee report to indicate how large a force will be required.

In my opinion, it will require not less than 300 to 400 clerks the first year to handle the claims to come under the pension part of this bill. It will take 1,000 clerks to do this, I firmly believe, after the first year.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It would require an increase of force in the Pension Department, would it not?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; I hardly think so. They have a trained force, and a well-organized force there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But they are six months behind now in the current business. Does the gentleman think that the present force could take care of all of these claims without any increase in the force?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Does the gentleman from Missouri understand the reason why the pension force is six months behind?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have heard that they could not reach the cases.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Is not there some unusual reason?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is said that it is on account of the increase in widows' pensions.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Last September, or about a year ago, we passed the widows' pension bill, and some three or four hundred thousand claims were dumped in on the bureau in the space of one or two months.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have been increasing the force in the Pension Bureau from year to year for many years past. At this time the bureau is congested with business and will be for some time to come. If this law is going to be of any value we must have a force ready to take care of and dispatch the business.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why should you create a new bureau?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We do not create a new bureau, it is extending a bureau already in existence.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Why not leave it in the Bureau of Pensions, and extend that force, if necessary, to work with the trained force?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from New Jersey was in favor of turning it over to the War Department.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will permit, I did not suggest that pensions should be turned over to the War Department.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; the gentleman said that the family allowance should be turned over to the War Department and the insurance provision he put up in the air.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I said that the War Department should take care of its own compensation and the Naval Department take care of its compensation on the part of the boy while he is in the service, and the Pension Department should take care of the pension.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is not there danger in this bill, in conferring the administration of the proposed pensions upon the Treasury Department, of making that department so strong politically that it will overshadow Congress and every other department of the Government?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I do not know about that; the gentleman is entitled to his own opinion.

A new and raw force of clerks will, of course, at first allow many claims which should not be allowed and deny many which should be allowed. These errors will have to be corrected and this will cause both hardship and expense. The Pension Bureau, with its trained force of clerks, would not commit these errors and hence would save this expense. So much for the lack of wisdom in the proposal to create a new Pension Bureau, which is not needed.

Now, let me speak of the great injustice this bill, if it becomes a law, will work to several classes of pensioners and to those who should be pensioners.

First, there is the soldier or sailor who in the discharge of his duty in service has a disability—a grave and serious disability—which he can prove beyond a doubt is due to the service; perhaps there is a record showing this is true. Under the provisions of this bill he must apply within two years or else he is forever barred from a pension. Is this right? Is this just? I say, "No." It is the first time in the history of this great Government that a statute of limitations has ever been proposed between a soldier or sailor who suffers from a disability procured in defense of his country and a proper pension therefor.

I am sorry such a statute is proposed, and I hope it will never become a law.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Has the gentleman overlooked a provision in the law that the time could be extended for cause shown?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; the statute of limitations of one year would run unless under the special provision it is extended to run one more year. That is the way I read the bill, but the bill is so involved that a good many things will escape the notice of Members before we are through with it, even if the bill is carefully studied under the five-minute rule.

Second, this same unjust and unkind statute is proposed as to claims of widows whose husbands' death were due to his service and line of duty, unless, at discharge, the medical officer stated he believed he would die from disability due to service. We all know that in raising this vast Army and Navy we must appoint young doctors, and even then the supply is short. How easy, by hasty examination, at discharge or through lack of capacity to realize what fatal sequences may follow a given disability he fails to certify death may follow, yet death does follow and is due to the disability. Again I say I hope no statute of limitations will ever become a law to deprive such a widow of her just rights.

Third. Is it right to give a soldier or sailor who serves in this war less than you now give one who served in one of the other wars for the same disability, which each incurred or contracted in service and duty defending his country? I think not.

Fourth. I now come to the question of widows. It is here that the most grave and serious injustice occurs in this bill. To illustrate, let me draw you a picture of what this bill provides as to widows. I have no doubt there are many cases like it—a great many, in fact.

Here is an aged and feeble, gray-haired widow. Her husband was killed in battle during the Civil War, leaving her with a girl infant in arms. This child grows up and marries. Her husband is killed in battle in Cuba during the War with Spain, leaving her with an infant daughter. This child is united in marriage with a man who is killed in France. Each is a widow. The gray-haired and feeble grandmother, the middle-aged mother, and the young and strong granddaughter. The husband of each gave his life to his country in its defense. The existing pension laws give to the old grandmother $20 and to the mother $12. The pending bill proposes to give to the youngest and strongest and the one most able to earn a living "not less than $30." Is this right? Is it just? If one is given $30 why not the others? I can not see. I would like some friend of this bill to explain this to me.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Where is the injustice to come to a widow under this bill? Does the gentleman think that the allowance under this bill is too large, or that for the Civil War widow is too small?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. What I object to is the discrimination.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman answer the question; are we giving the widow under this bill too much?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I am not prepared to say what this country is able to do or what the House feels that it is able to do, but I do not know why you should discriminate. Here is the widow of a young man who lost his life at Santiago, and that woman is entitled to $30 if this widow in this bill is entitled to $30. Under existing law the widow who lost her husband in the Philippines can get $12 a month and $2 for each minor child.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would the gentleman move to amend the bill by reducing the amount to $12 a month?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is not a fair proposition. I am willing to vote as much to the widow of these soldiers as any man in this House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and if in his opinion the widows of other wars are not getting sufficient money he ought to bring in some legislation. Does the gentleman think that the widows under this bill are to get any greater compensation than the widows of this war should receive?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I am not raising that question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, yes, the gentleman is; he is saying it is too much.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I did not say it was too much.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then there is no way to equalize them.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The only way that could be done with the pension laws as they are to-day is to let some member of this House introduce a bill, refer it to the Committee on Pensions, and if it should come before that committee, or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I will guarantee it will receive proper consideration and a proper bill will be reported back to the House.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the gentleman think the very fact they only get $12 a month under the old law, which you and I advocated, shows that law is antiquated and ought to be superseded by some humane, just, and modern law?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think owing to the high cost of living the present rate should be increased, but treat like cases alike.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Would it not remedy the defect to amend this bill so that the provision will be applicable not only to those who are now serving but will serve in France, but those who have heretofore served, so that all widows will be placed on an equality?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think so.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he does not think such a bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Pensions so as to have the testimony of experts on it?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think all matters pertaining to pension legislation; that is, in reference to the Civil War, should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and legislation affecting soldiers of wars other than the Civil War should go to the other committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the Pension Committee has had charge of these things for so many years and comes in and confesses the provisions are inadequate, do they think they are any more expert than those who propose to do right?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Absolutely not. I am not complaining about present pension rates, but I am complaining of the injustice of this bill. Let us put all on an equality.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman can do it by raising these figures, which according to his confession should have been done long ago.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If the gentleman will introduce a bill and it is referred to my committee I will promise him a prompt report.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not dealing with pensions. Great bills like this, based on insurance and the insurance law, are referred to our committee that is always ready to tackle it and do our duty. The gentleman has not stated that anything in it is too much or wrong, but it is a confession that his own legislation is inadequate.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to his present bill to put the other Civil War and Spanish War widows on an equality with those provided for here?

Mr. ADAMSON. We are satisfied—we are well satisfied—with our bill. We think its equilibrium is as perfect as any piece of legislation ever was. If you will take it by and large as a whole, I do not think any man can improve upon it by amendment.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman consider an amendment to put the other widows on the same plane?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will vote against it promptly.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is what I thought.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman from Georgia says he will vote against an amendment, thereby showing that he thinks the compensation of this bill is too high.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. KEY of Ohio. I have been interrupted so much that I would ask for five minutes more. I can conclude in three minutes.

Mr. ESCH. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. One more point as to widows and I am through. Under the present pension laws a widow who is guilty of open and notorious adultery can not receive a pension. The act of August 7, 1882, provides her pension ceases. Under this bill you annul all pension laws as far as its benefits go. This bill provides a widow shall receive a pension until death or remarriage. I fear that should you enact this bill into law you will encourage morally weak women—widows, beyond doubt, of soldiers or sailors killed in service—to enter into adulterous cohabitation with selfish and vicious men in order that she be enabled to continue to receive a pension, upon which both would live. Should they do this, there is no provision in the bill which could or would prevent her from receiving the pension.

Now, in conclusion, if Congress desires, in view of the high cost of living expenses, to raise the pension rates of the existing general law—and this bill is nothing less than the general law with changed rates and some added and most unjust features—then let some Member introduce a bill to so amend the general pension law and send it to the Committee on Pensions. I will promise you that it will be given full, fair, and proper consideration and be reported to this body for action. But I promise you two things in connection therewith:

First, I shall use my utmost endeavors to see that the same provision is made for disabilities and death due to former wars as that given in connection with the present war; and, second, that the Pension Bureau be charged, as it should be, with the administration of the proposed law.

No Member of this body will go further or try to do more than I am in favor of doing to generously provide for the brave soldiers and sailors, and their dependent relatives, who have been called to defend our homes and country and who in the discharge of this duty sustain partial or total disabilities or meet death. But my contention is that in doing this we be fair and just to those who did the same thing in former wars—that we treat all like cases alike.

In this connection, on September 4, 1917, in that splendid address to the soldiers and sailors, and really to all citizens of this country, our great and learned President said:

Let us set for ourselves a standard so high that it will be a glory to live up to it, and then let us live up to it and add a new laurel to the crown of America.

We will not obey this wonderful admonition by enacting the pension part of this bill into law, with its unjust and unwise provisions that I have just pointed out to you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter appearing in the hearings. Quite a number of Members have called at my office and asked for a copy of these hearings and I have been unable to provide them. I would like to ask unanimous consent that this letter, together with the table, be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio. [Mr. KEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the matter indicated. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TO AMEND THE BUREAU OF INSURANCE ACT SO AS TO INSURE THE MEN IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

MARION, OHIO, August 21, 1917.

Judge WILLIAM C. ADAMSON,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: Referring to H. R. 5723, I have decided to submit the following comments, in accordance with your suggestion:

I regret that I could not be heard by your committee when I appeared, but realize it was impossible for you to give me a hearing on that day, and I had to leave for Ohio that night.

H. R. 5723, if enacted into law in its present form, would provide three separate and distinct things, to wit:

First. Financial support for dependent relatives of a soldier or sailor during his service.

Second. Insurance against death or material disablement in service.

Third. Pensions, under name of compensation, in case of death or permanent disability.

Now, as to the first two provisions mentioned, I desire to make no comment. In some form I believe both of these principles are wise and just, and I shall await the report of your committee concerning same.

As to the third provision of the bill—pensions—I firmly believe it should be stricken entirely from the measure, for the following reasons:

First. Many members of the Committee on Pensions hold that your committee has no jurisdiction over any measure that seeks to amend, annul, or otherwise affect existing pension laws. I join with them in this view.

Second. If enacted in its present form, the bill would completely annul what is known as the general pension law. This law has, in practically its present form, been in existence for more than 100 years. It provides certain and specific pensions at given rates, for disabilities due to wounds, injuries, and diseases incurred or contracted in service and line of duty from the date an application is filed. It requires positive proof that the disabilities are due to service and line of duty.

This law has covered the service of soldiers and sailors in the War of 1812, the earlier Indian wars, the War with Mexico, the Civil War, and the War with Spain. It was, in principle, followed as to the Revolutionary War. All who served during these wars were volunteers. The law worked well and is still working well with them. Those who must serve in the present great war are not volunteers. They are drafted. Is it fair or just that they be now denied the same generous and specific rates of pensions, under a plain and simple law, which can be easily understood by everyone, that covered the service of those who served in the preceding wars? I do not think so. I do not believe the present general law should be either annulled or amended. If you will give this law careful study and contrast it with the involved and very obscure provisions as to pensions of the bill you are now considering, I feel sure you will agree with me in this conclusion. In order that you may do this, I am attaching tables of rates under the general law.

I should, perhaps, make mention of one grave injustice the enactment of the pending bill would work, to wit: If a soldier or sailor is killed or his death is shown clearly due to the service, under the pending law, his widow would receive a pension of not less than $30 a month (see p. 17, lines 15, 16). There are many widows now pensioned at $12 per month whose husbands' deaths were shown due to the service and line of duty in the Civil War and in the War with Spain. The pending bill does not seek to give to these a higher rate in keeping with the new widows to come. Why not? Both are widows because their husbands lost their lives in defending their country. The same injustice applies to mothers, only in a less degree.

Again, I find in the pending bill provision to pay the widow until her death, or for two years after her remarriage, should she remarry. I can conceive of no time in the life of a widow when she stands so little in need of a pension than the two years following her remarriage. But I can see in this a grave danger to these young widows. It offers an opportunity for an unscrupulous man to marry them, live for two years, largely upon her pension, and then deliberately desert her.

Again, the pending bill requires in case of partial disability that in order to obtain the benefits offered that a claim be filed within one year from discharge, or two years if specially allowed by those charged with the adjudication of the claim. After two years, however, he is forever barred from the benefits of this proposed law by its terms. This is wholly wrong, in my opinion. No man who is disabled, and can so prove, in the service of his country and line of duty should ever be barred by any statute of limitations in asking proper and just remuneration for the disability. Under the present law he could file a claim at any time, but he must prove the disability due to service and line of duty, and then the pension only begins at date he does file a claim therefor. He alone loses by his delay in filing; but he never finds his Government has shut its doors in his face through a statute of limitations, and I hope he never will.

We now have a well-organized Pension Bureau, manned by a force skilled and trained in knowledge of the general pension law, and it is working smoothly in applying the principles of this good law to all claims which come before it, and will do so in all cases to come in the future. In the matter of the point as to lawful widowhood alone, the experience and knowledge of this trained force is most valuable, if not, in fact, essential to wise and proper adjudication of the claims to come. You can not enact a Federal "yardstick" law as to lawful widowhood that will be constitutional and valid. This arises from the fact that the several States have absolute jurisdiction as to what shall constitute lawful marriage within its bounds, and of course these State laws govern lawful widowhood within its territory. Some States recognize a common-law marriage as valid; others do not. Some recognize marriage as legally consummated by very slight ceremony; others demand most rigid compliance with existing statutes. Some recognize as a valid marriage a marriage that arose in common-law territory, where same was valid through comity, although such marriage is not recognized in its own territory; others do not recognize such principles of comity. In fact, not a claim of any character could arise out of this great war which this force, from its training and experience, would not be able to expeditiously dispose of with equal justice to the Government and the claimant. Why change the law in the first place, or take from this trained force the matter of adjudication of pension claims? Your bill by its pension provision would practically amount to creating two pension bureaus. Is such action wise, needful, or economical? I think not.

Now, finally, there are two kinds of pension laws in force at present. They are radically different. In principle they are as follows:

First. The general law, which, as set forth above, only gives pension where death or disability is clearly shown due to the service and line of duty; to the widow from date of her husband's death; to the soldier or sailor from the date of filing his claim.

Second. The service laws, so called, that began with the act of June 27, 1890, and are now in force under acts of May 11, 1912, as to soldiers and sailors, and September 8, 1916, as to widows in connection with service in the War with Mexico and the Civil War, and the act of March 4, 1917, as to soldiers and their widows who served during certain Indian wars. These so-called service laws do not require that the death of the soldier or sailor, or any disability, be shown due in any way, directly or indirectly, to his service. They are, in fact, only based upon length of service, and either the death of the husband, in the widow's case, or his present age in his own case.

In the bill pending before your committee and the testimony as regards same I fancy I see a strange confusion as to the two kinds of pension laws of our country and the cost of same. I have not the exact figures before me, but in round numbers we pay about $165,000,000 each year in pensions. Of this I have no doubt at least $130,000,000 goes to pay the pensioners under the so-called service laws. Your bill will not in any way affect these, but it works a sad injustice to those who would be entitled under the general law, as I have shown.

Many do not believe in service laws, and these would counsel and advise that all such laws be annulled. If you did this, however, you would at once fill the poorhouses of every State with aged soldiers and sailors and their widows who had served during the War with Mexico and the Civil War. Of course, no such action would be taken by Congress.

Permit me to state that there is no such thing possible as the enactment of a permanent, just, and perfect and unchangeable pension law. No future Congress, as we both know, is bound by any pension legislation of a former Congress. All future Congresses possess the right to amend, annul, suspend, or continue any pension law that they find in existence. The life of a pension law depends wholly upon the wisdom and justice of its provisions. No future Congress will permit it to live one day after it has been found lacking in these qualities.

In conclusion, I beg to state that in my opinion, should the pending bill be enacted with its present provisions, that on account of the grave injustices which I have pointed out in this letter within a year from the date of its passage, Congress will be flooded by bills, seeking by special act of Congress individual cases to adjust, rectify, and remove the inequalities and injustice. So great will be the merit possessed by these cases that Congress will be forced, in a spirit of justice, to either pass thousands of special acts or by a general law remove the inequalities and injustices cited.

Will you not kindly lay this letter before your committee, in accordance with our agreement which I entered into at your suggestion?

Respectfully,

JOHN A. KEY,
Chairman Committee on Pensions.

Section 4699, Revised Statutes, provides that the rate of $18 per month may be proportionately divided for any degree of disability established for which section 4695 makes no provision.

The act of August 27, 1888, provides a $30 rate for total deafness and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to grant such proportion thereof in cases of partial deafness as he may deem equitable. Act January 15, 1903, increases rate for total deafness to $40. Rates on partial degrees not affected.

The act of March 2, 1895, provides that "All pensioners now on the rolls who are pensioned at less than $6 per month for any degree of pensionable disability shall have their pensions increased to $6 per month; and that hereafter whenever any applicant for pension would, under existing rates, be entitled to less than $6 for any single disability or several combined disabilities, such pensioner shall be rated at not less than $6 per month: Provided also, That the provisions hereof shall not be held to cover any pensionable period prior to the passage of this act, nor authorize a rating of any claim for any part of such period, nor prevent the allowance of lower rates than $6 per month, according to the existing practice in the Pension Office in pending cases covering any pensionable period prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, as Members of Congress, on account of the actions of a great nation and its refusal to cease murdering our innocent children, women, and men, we have declared war.

As the Hon. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, so well expressed it the other day:

We are engaged in a war which, in my opinion, is a war than which in the whole history of the world no war, not even our Revolution, was more justified. If we should fail—and I am as confident that we shall not fail as I am that we are living—but if by any means we could fail, all the struggles for American independence and all the ideas and ideals for which we have been jointly striving in one way or the other will have been in vain.

Believing that the only fair and square way to raise an army is one in which one man is on the same footing as another, we have passed the selective-draft bill.

Believing that our soldiers and sailors and our workers at home should receive the necessities of life at a reasonable figure, we have passed a food and fuel control bill, and when this bill gets into active working we will have the food sharks and the fuel pirates either in jail or out of business.

To-day we are getting ready to go one step further. This bill provides compensation and insurance for those men we have selected to give up "their liberty, their positions, their opportunities, and, going to the front, perhaps hazarding their lives and their limbs and their health for this country and for democracy."

We have selected them to do the fighting for us. The very minute we selected them to do the fighting we placed them in the position where they could no longer secure life insurance at any except exorbitant rates. More than that, unless the insurance has been taken out for a year or so, we raise the rates on even that life insurance. Under the circumstances, who should pay the extra hazard, the man who is going to do the fighting—and his family, because they suffer in case of his death or disability—for us or the rest of the people, who have sent him to do the fighting for them? It is the height of injustice to expect a man not only to do the fighting but to pay exorbitant rates of insurance for the protection of his loved ones.

This bill provides for four things:

First. All soldiers and sailors are required to allot a certain part of their wages—not less than $15 per month—to their dependents.

Second. That the Government shall pay certain sums of money monthly to dependents of soldiers and sailors, this to be in addition to allotment made by soldiers and sailors themselves.

Third. This section provides—

A full table and schedule of compensation for injuries after the manner of the compensation laws for similar cases.

The bill provides specifically the compensation in each case whether for death or complete disability or partial disability on loss of a particular member of the body. All of this is fixed and compulsory.

By the way to show the difference in the old pension plan and the new way. Under the old way, the law provides a new wooden leg every three years for a man who lost his leg in action. We teach him in addition a trade so that he can be in position to support himself with what is left of his anatomy.

Fourth. This section provides that any soldier or sailor, at his option—not compulsory—can purchase term life insurance (up to $5,000) at a rate of $8 per annum. Strange to say, this section will be the hardest fought section of the bill.

The following from the Washington Herald, September 2, 1917, explains itself:

Insurance companies operating in the District have canceled all health and accident insurance policies on men drawn.

In addition, companies writing industrial insurance have increased the rate on life policies from $20 to $50 per thousand. Lieut. Lee, son of former Senator Blair Lee, of Maryland, recently sought to take out a policy for $25,000 with one of the largest life insurance companies. After consultation with the home office the company reduced the amount of the principal to $5,000 and increased the ordinary rate $30 per thousand so that the annual premium amounts to $250 per year.

Under the terms of the health and accident policies the company maintains the right to revoke them at any time for sufficient reason and return premiums. Most of the large casualty companies have already adopted this procedure.

I do not blame the insurance companies for increasing their rates somewhat, but I do blame them when not wishing to carry the risk themselves they do not wish this Government to give these men protection for fear the Government may "go into the insurance business." Personally, I do not believe that the companies would be hurt if the Government did go into the insurance business, but even if we do hurt the business of the life insurance companies temporarily we owe it to these soldiers and sailors that they receive a reasonable amount of life insurance protection for their families at a reasonable cost.

Suppose the Government does lose some money by writing term insurance at the rate of $8 per thousand. Under a scientific plan of this kind, carefully administered, we certainly will be able to do it at less cost than the old system of pensions, with all its extravagances of different kinds and its political abuses.

The following from the Official Bulletin, published by the Committee on Public Information, September 1, 1917, also explains itself:

ELEVEN FATALITIES IN EVERY 1,000 OF MOBILIZED STRENGTH IN FIGHTING ON WESTERN FRONT—DEATH LIST LARGEST EARLY IN WAR—PROPORTION OF THOSE DYING OF WOUNDS OR KILLED IN ACTION NEVER GREATER THAN 20 PER CENT OF ALL CASUALTIES.

The Committee on Public Information has obtained from official sources the most nearly accurate figures possible on the percentage of fatalities in relation to casualties on the western front. These figures, taken when the casualties were greatest in proportion to mobilized strength and combined with the highest proportion of deaths, show losses due to deaths from wounds and killed in action to be approximately 11 in every 1,000 of mobilized strength.

HIGH-WATER MARK EARLY IN WAR.

According to the figures presented by the French high commissioner in his letter to the Secretary of War, the high-water mark of casualties in the French Army was reached early in the war—at the Battles of Charleroi and the Marne. The casualties in that period were 5.41 per cent of the mobilized strength, or 541 men in every 10,000 with the colors.

Military experts in this country agree that the killed in action and died of wounds have never at any time in this war exceeded 20 per cent of the total casualties. This gives a figure of 108.2 fatalities from these causes in every 10,000 mobilized strength, or practically 11 men killed in action or died of wounds for every 1,000 men with the colors.

Every 1,000 men would pay (under this bill) $8,000 per year in premiums. Eleven deaths at $1,000 would be $11,000. How much more would the opponents of this bill desire to have these men pay?

As the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] states that testimony showed that 75 out of every 1,000 men at the front are killed, while the letter from the French high commissioner states they were only 11 per thousand, he will have to deduct near six-sevenths of what he estimates the cost will be. I expect to take this matter up further under the 5-minute rule.

Most insurance companies will write term insurance at a very cheap rate. I know something about life insurance and something about term insurance.

Give your application to any insurance agent, and he will get you term insurance around $8 per thousand—the price the Government expects to charge the soldier in this bill.

If you are 21, you can get a five-year term—convertible but not renewable—nonparticipating policy for $8 per thousand.

If you are 22, it will cost you $8.06 per thousand.

If you are 23, it will cost you $8.11 per thousand.

If you are 24, it will cost you $8.17 per thousand.

If you are 25, it will cost you $8.25 per thousand.

If you are 26, it will cost you $8.32 per thousand.

If you are 27, it will cost you $8.39 per thousand.

If you are 28, it will cost you $8.48 per thousand.

If you are 29, it will cost you $8.57 per thousand.

If you are 30, it will cost you $8.67 per thousand.

This is an average of about $8.30 per thousand. Out of this, the companies pay a liberal commission to their agents. How much more is it worth to carry the risk in war times? Some companies seem to think that $50 per thousand would be necessary, others have written insurance for soldiers of the allies—everything considered—at a cost of about $13 per thousand, as I will show a little later. Unfortunately for them they did not divide their risk enough.

Let us see what some of those who favor this bill say.

Hon. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and member of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense:

I feel, in expressing the views of the executive committee of the committee on labor, composed of nearly 500 men and possibly 100 women, that some of the biggest business men, financiers, publicists, scientists, and humanitarians have expressed themselves without the slightest dissent in favor of this measure. Speaking for them as well as for myself I have not seen a measure prepared for introduction in the Congress of the United States that seemed so perfect a piece of legislation as the one prepared by Judge Mack and his associates.

One of the things which interests me much in this measure is that it can not help but give heart and courage and hope to the men who are going to the front. It can not help but remove from their minds the apprehension that away back home their wives and their children, their mothers, sisters, fathers are not to be objects of charity; that they may know when they come back that they can go to their little rooms which they left and that they will be unimpaired; and that their dependents will be there to welcome them; and that, so far as we can have it so, the American standard of living shall be maintained in the homes while the men are fighting at the front.

The measure is a departure from the old pension system, and it is intended to be a departure. It is intended that the old pension system shall go, and that this newer concept of compensation, allowance, and indemnities shall take its place, just the same as the workman's compensation laws have taken the place of the old employers' liability laws, with their common-law defenses and some other defenses.

I am under the impression that when this measure shall have been enacted into law you will hear very little about claims for pensions. It is the very antithesis of the pension system. I want to give this bill the heartiest approval.

We are engaged in a war which, in my opinion, is a war than which in the whole history of the world no war, not even our Revolution, was more justified. If we should fail—and I am as confident that we shall not fail as I am that we are living—but if by any means we could fail, all the struggles for American independence, and all the ideas and ideals for which we have been jointly striving in one way or another will have been in vain.

Hon. H. E. Wills, assistant grand chief engineer and national legislative representative, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers:

I want to say in behalf of the train service organization—the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen—Brother Clark is here to speak for the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors—that we are in favor of the bill as drafted, and we would be glad indeed if we could see the bill enacted into law as soon as possible.

Hon. W. M. Clark, vice president and national legislative representative Order of Railway Conductors:

My purpose in speaking now is to place the organization which I have the honor to represent, the Order of Railway Conductors, on record as absolutely in favor of this bill.

Hon. A. L. Hereford, representative National Fraternal Congress:

The congress (National Fraternal Congress) represents about 40,000,000 of the people of this country—the congress has largely indorsed this bill. They (representatives of some of the old line insurance companies) succeeded in making some of our people believe that the Government was going into the life insurance business, but after discussing this bill for three or four days, and after hearing a full explanation of it by Judge Mack, we succeeded in getting practically all of them to realize that this was merely additional compensation to the boys that this Government has gone out with a strong hand and put into the Army and put into a hazardous occupation where they are unable to get life insurance at any reasonable cost; that this country owes that much to them, and in the end a resolution indorsing that feature, at least by implication, was unanimously adopted. We feel that as we are going to take care of our men that the Government, in justice, ought to take care of the others. Therefore, the National Fraternal Congress, representing nearly 40,000,000 members in this country, indorses this measure.

AMERICAN ALLIANCE FOR LABOR AND DEMOCRACY.

At its meeting held at Minneapolis on September 7, among the resolutions adopted were the following:

INDORSES SOLDIERS' INSURANCE.

Believing that the material interests of the Nation's soldiers and sailors and of their dependents should be withdrawn from the realm of charity and chance, and that health and life should be fully insured, we indorse the soldiers' and sailors' bill now before Congress.

National Tribune, Washington, the recognized organ of the Grand Army of the Republic. This paper stated in part in its last issue:

The principal objection to the bill, as voiced by many Members of Congress, is that it will put the Government into direct competition with the insurance companies.

The war insurance bill has many excellent features and few to which objection can be raised. Of course the bill is being vigorously opposed by the big insurance companies which see their prospects of enormous profits rapidly vanishing.

Among those who oppose it are some deserters who are on the roll or who are trying to get on. You take a man who served in the Civil War. He has to have an honorable discharge, and a man who saw service in the Spanish-American War has to have an honorable discharge, but not so with the man who joins your Regular Army to-day. He needs no honorable discharge—all he needs is a discharge.

Who, then, oppose this bill? Well, among those who oppose it are the pension grafters and those who would like to be. Every man trying to get a pension and whose disability came from indecent disease, or from drunkenness, or from his own misdeeds will oppose this bill.

Every deserter—not only those now on the rolls but those trying to get there—will naturally oppose a bill of this merit.

When it gets down to pensions, then most people are political cowards. They will stand for any bill that they think will help them if they vote for it and will hurt them if they vote against it. Safety first. How else can you account it possible for us to have on our books a law that makes it possible for a man to enlist to-day, desert to-morrow, being able to secure a pension?

Do you know that according to the present pension law it is possible for a man to enlist, desert, be apprehended, court-martialed, found guilty, sentenced, serve sentence, receive a dishonorable discharge, and yet be eligible to receive a pension, providing that alleged disabilities are shown to have been incurred in service and in line of duty? This refers to the general pension law affecting all soldiers, sailors, and marines, regardless of time of service. Many who desert and who are afterwards dishonorably discharged for that account are to-day receiving a pension from the United States.

I have in mind the case of a man who joined the Army May 12, 1904, and deserted July 21, 1904—or a little over two months in the service. He applied for pension in 1913, based on disease of kidneys and bladder. His claim was rejected once, then reopened, and again rejected, and the last heard, the department stated that papers recently filed were "being considered with a view to determining whether reopening of the soldier's rejected claim is warranted," and so forth. Perhaps by this time this brave citizen is on the rolls.

The evidence further shows that this brave fellow not only deserted his country, but his wife and child. In a letter that I have, signed by the deserted wife, it appears that he and his brother lived off of the earnings of this woman all winter and then deserted her in the spring. Her letter states in part: "I kept him and his brother almost all winter, and as soon as it got warm they both left me. I washed for the living and to pay the rent, and I can prove it by all my neighbors that neither one would work when they could get it." He not only deserted his wife, but his baby son as well. What do you think of a law that will allow a brute like this to be on the pension rolls?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are no such men as that on the pension rolls.

Mr. JAMES. There are.

I introduced a bill to prevent paying of pensions to a person of this kind. One would believe that a bill of this kind would be reported out immediately. Although a member of the Pension Committee, I have not been able to get any action on the bill. Why? I do not know unless it is as the noted Henry Waterson stated some time ago in the Louisville Courier-Journal:

Deserters have votes and Congressmen need votes.

Anyone who has been on the Pension Committee knows that thousands of applications are filed each year where the evidence shows that the applicant is suffering from nothing but his own misdeeds.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I had long service on the Pension Committee, and I never heard of such a case.

Mr. JAMES. There are such cases. I can show you the evidence from the Bureau of Pensions.

Rule No. 3 of the rules of the Pension Committee reads as follows:

Rule 3. In no instance will a bill be considered by this committee in connection with which the records of the War or Navy Departments show medical treatment for syphilis or other venereal disease of an aggravated character unless the Bureau of Pensions has specifically waived the same as a factor in present disabilities or cause of death.

Judging from a good deal of the evidence that I have read as a member of the Pension Committee, this rule ought to have been adopted and enforced many years ago.

At the last session, among those taken care of was a man tried at a general court-martial convened March 24, 1865, on the following charges: First, robbery; second, deserting his guard; third, disobedience of orders; fourth, violation of the Forty-fifth Article of War (drunkenness on duty); fifth, assault and battery.

The court found him guilty of all charges and sentenced him to be shot to death with musketry. The proceedings and findings of the court were approved and the sentence was mitigated to confinement at hard labor in such penitentiary as the Secretary of War shall direct for the period of five years.

Last session a bill allowing a pension to this man was introduced in the Senate by the then chairman of the Pension Committee allowing him a pension at the rate of $30 per month. This bill passed the Senate and one night about 10 o'clock this item passed the House. This was the night when Senate bill No. 8113, containing 266 items, Senate bill containing 40 items, Senate bill No. 8295, containing 144 items, and Senate bill No. 8120, containing 106 items, passed the House with no discussion. As I called attention to a day or so later, most of these items in these bills had been introduced 12 months before, but for some reason or other were held back until the closing hours of the session.

Another item that passed that night—even members of the committee who reported out the bill admitted that they did not know that item was in the bill, or they would have rejected it—was one that had been turned down by the Committee on Pensions of the House. Then the introducer of the bill or the beneficiary of the bill, one or the other, had one of the Senators rush a bill through. The bill had been rejected three times by the House committee. Evidence before our committee showed that officer was killed while joy riding; evidence also showed that the widow was working in the War Department at $75 per month; and yet the Senator who introduced the bill in a letter written several days after we had rejected the case for the third time wrote a letter to the Senate Pension Committee stating that applicant was "nearly destitute."

When we pass a bill of this kind it will do away with this kind of work. I hope to see the day when it will not be necessary to have a Committee on Pensions. This bill will go a long way toward it, and is one reason why I favor the bill so strongly. Let us take care of everyone who deserves it, but let us do away with pension grafting.

One of the most bitter but truthful attacks on the vicious pension system that I have read for some time is an editorial in the Hancock (Mich.) Journal, in which the editor says in part:

It is said opposition is already appearing, because it would upset the pension system—

Whatever that may mean—

Everyone knows our present pension system. Everyone knows for years Congress played politics with it, ignoring many worthy old heroes who had no pull.

The Civil War practically ended in 1865. There were on the pension rolls in 1873, eight years later, when one would think the high tide of claims would have been reached, 119,500 invalids and 118,911 widows. In 1916, 51 years after, there were on the rolls 403,120 invalids and 306,542 widows, only a small minority due to the Spanish-American and Philippine campaigns.

In 1873 the Government disbursed nearly $27,000,000 for pensions. In 1916 it expended over $159,000,000.

The Government has already paid out over $4,765,000,000 in Civil War pensions, some justly, some unjustly.

The present administration desires to prevent a repetition of this. The insurance plan will give the Government something definite to go on. There will be no pull and haul at Washington before Pension Bureaus, no miserable spectacle of rival parties in Congress seeking the "soldier vote" by lavish waste of the people's money.

It will cut out only those who do not deserve it.

The insurance plan will bring relief to all who deserve it.

Who else oppose this bill? Well, some insurance companies appear to.

Are these insurance companies opposed to soldiers carrying life insurance? They are not.

Have any insurance companies carried similar insurance for any of the soldiers of any of the allies? They have.

Have any American companies written any of this kind of insurance? They have.

Are the rates, everything considered, on business they have written much in advance of the rates proposed to be charged by the Government in this bill? They are not, as I will prove later on.

Are these companies willing that the Government shall carry a policy of life insurance on every soldier and sailor if the Government pays all the cost? They are.

Then is it true that the only objections these men have to the bill is that they are afraid if the insurance is optional and the premium is paid by the soldier himself that the Government may enter the insurance business later on and thus hurt their business?

I will answer that question by using their own language:

Our committee distinctly objects to the insurance article of the bill because there is no reference in the bill to the fact that this Article IV is a war measure, nor is there any statement of intention of abandoning the issuance of new insurance under this article when the war is over.

This is a very frank statement and covers very completely their objection to this part of the bill. I might say that this seems to be the true objection of the minority report as well.

The minority report says it is against the bill for four reasons.

Reason No. 1 is that it will mean the establishment of a new bureau, which is "a needless waste of money."

This bill amends a bill approved on September 2, 1914, the title of which reads: "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department." This act put the Government into the business of carrying marine insurance on vessels and their cargoes. The bill has been amended since that time making it broader still. When we amended this bill several months ago compelling vessel owners to carry insurance on their men we put the Government still further in the insurance business. I do not find that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] protested against the Government going into the insurance business then.

Of course, the original bill was for the protection of the property of vessel owners and merchants, and the present bill is only for the protection of our soldiers. I do not believe that the friends of the minority report wish us to believe that they favor the Government going into the insurance business when owners of vessels and cargoes are to receive the protecting hand of the Government and against it when the bill goes further and provides for the same protecting hand being placed over our soldiers. [Applause.]

The fourth reason reads:

The Government, if it wishes the men insured, should insure them itself.

How strangely this language sounds like one of the objections of Mr. Ide, representing the insurance companies, who says:

Our committee did not object in any way to this insurance for the soldiers and sailors in addition to the other benefits of the bill, provided it was equitably given to all—which can only be the case if the Government bears all the cost—

And so forth.

How strangely like this language of Mr. Ide—

And we believe that the costs and disbursements should be borne wholly by the Government.

Practically all of the fraternal societies are showing the right kind of spirit in these war times. Some of them are furnishing every member of their order who enters the Army or Navy with a policy for $1,000. This naturally means that less insurance will be asked for by the soldiers and sailors in this bill. All will see that insurance of members in the service of the United States is kept in full force.

FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES.

At the national convention of the Fraternal Order of Eagles held at Buffalo lately it was decided by unanimous vote to insure every member of the order who enters the Army or Navy with a policy of $1,000.

FORESTERS OF AMERICA.

On August 31, 1917, at Portland, Me., the supreme court of the Foresters of America voted to establish a $500,000 emergency fund to pay death claims of members who die in service and to purchase life insurance for each member.

KNIGHTS OF THE MACCABEES.

On August 28, 1917, Hon. D. P. Markey, supreme commander, is referred to as follows by the Mining Journal, Marquette, Mich.:

Mr. Markey is a most enthusiastic worker for the Army and Navy, and it was largely because of his advice that the society of which he is the presiding officer, at its recent supreme session, adopted laws that are helpful to the Government and the members who will go to the front. No member's insurance will be affected by joining Uncle Sam's fighting forces. The beneficiaries of these members will be taken care of in the same manner as will the beneficiaries of those who remain at home.

I understand that other fraternal organizations have taken action similar to the Eagles, Foresters of America, and Maccabees, and I hope to have more information as to the exact details before this debate is closed.

If they—the fraternal societies—take care of their men who join the Army and Navy, we ought to do our share.

We must not forget that when we draft the soldiers in many cases we not only draft the wage earner of the family, but we also draft the "entire family to the flag; the sacrifice is not divisible." In many cases it is the mother and father who are involved in the sacrifice—in other cases it is the wife and the little ones.

"They suffer just as much as the soldier, but in a different way; and the Nation must generously discharge as a proud privilege the duty of maintaining them until the soldiers and sailors return from war and resume the responsibility."

Some people will call this bill a socialistic measure. Well, it was not many years ago when anyone advocating working-men's compensation was considered a Socialist, but who thinks so now?

A little later those who advocate mothers' compensation laws were considered Socialists, but who thinks so now?

Those who favor this kind of legislation and those who favor old-age insurance, compulsory health and accident insurance, and employment insurance may be called Socialists now, but in a few years from now these measures, too, will be looked upon as safe and sane.

In good plain English, here is the real situation regarding the Government furnishing a reasonable amount of insurance to men at absolute cost—peace-time cost. We know, and the insurance companies know, that these men are from a physical point of view the very best risks, every man A No. 1 in every respect, because they have all been submitted to a strict physical examination and found without a blemish.

But from an insurance point of view, on account of their being selected to go to France to fight and, if need be, to offer up their lives for us, they are not a good risk. To carry such a risk the life insurance companies—and they are justified in asking this in justice to their other policyholders—ask an extra hazard.

Then the Government steps in and we say: "In peace times you could get insurance for $8 per thousand. On account of the extra hazard that we subject you to you have to pay an extra war premium. If you wish insurance for a reasonable amount you pay us the $8 per thousand and we will pay the difference. If we could get the insurance companies to write this risk at a reasonable figure, it might be policy for us to take it from them, but if they will not, then we intend to protect you ourselves, and we will stand the difference because we are the ones who made it necessary for you to pay this extra hazard. We do not intend that your dependents and yourselves shall suffer because we have called upon you to do our fighting."

That is the exact situation and I can not see why anyone will oppose the Government insuring these sailors and soldiers under all the circumstances. To select a man to do the fighting, make him either lose or pay a high rate for his insurance, and then not provide insurance for him in some other way is absolutely wrong and can not be excused on any grounds. This bill, with the optional insurance feature, ought to pass this Congress without a single dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I will.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEAVER.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] as he desires.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the following telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, September 6, 1917.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I earnestly urge your active support of the soldiers' and sailors' insurance bill as presented by the national administration. The city of New York will have over 50,000 men in the service of the National Government in the near future. Hardships and difficulties will arise in some of their families which the city government will do everything in its power to alleviate, but it is both necessary and a matter of justice that some uniform and dependable provision should be made by the National Government.

JOHN PURROY MITCHEL, Mayor.

[Applause.]

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I agree with our patriotic mayor that this bill should receive the loyal and full-hearted support of this House. I have listened intensely for two days to the debate here and I have not heard anything that would tend to convince any Member that this is not a wise measure. We all agree that a bill of this type must be liberal in its treatment of the soldiers and sailors who are going forth to fight for our country, and they should know that those who are near and dear to them will be properly taken care of during their absence. No one claims that this is a perfect bill, but when it is taken up, say, paragraph by paragraph, various amendments will undoubtedly be offered which will help to perfect it. Great care should be taken to see that policies may not be assigned, because in that manner speculators will not be able to reap a harvest at the expense of our men. The whole opposition to this bill comes from those who favor a continuance of the old pension system and from life insurance companies, who see a loss of profits in their failure to obtain this business.

The whole subject has been intelligently discussed in an article which will appear in the October number of the Review of Reviews.

The article noted follows:

SOLDIERS' INSURANCE VERSUS PENSIONS.

[By Samuel McCune Lindsay, professor of social legislation, Columbia University.]

The principles of social insurance, applied to all sorts of risks and hazards in which the community has a stake or shares a responsibility, have been gaining in favor the world over in recent years. On the contrary, the principles of pension legislation in all countries have been found wanting and experience everywhere is leading to its abandonment.

Thirty-five years ago Germany began to apply scientific business management to the relations of government and the problems of social welfare in dealing with the public relief of distress, sickness, industrial accidents, invalidity, old age, and unemployment among wage earners. Under the masterful leadership of Bismarck, in harmony with a new national spirit and a modern sense of social responsibility and solidarity, a strongly centralized and comprehensive system of State insurance was started. Within 25 years this system not only became the characteristic and dominant feature of a powerful national government, but also became incorporated in its essential principles by the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and practically every country of Europe into a new development of democracy, a new function of government, a new attitude of peoples in their conception of the possibilities of social organization.

THE UNITED STATES A LAGGARD IN SOCIAL ORGANIZATION.

The United States alone has lagged behind and relied upon the older individualism of the poor law, administered by the smallest units of local government, upon the personal initiative of the injured person or his representatives to secure redress under the common law or the law of torts, upon employers' liability statutes, and upon equity procedure to remedy evils and achieve social justice. Of course, such methods long ago proved themselves inadequate in the face of the wonderful development of highly centralized organization, not only national but international in scope, which has characterized American industry during the past 50 years. The day of reckoning between the people and their governments, between effective business organization of common interests and political methods which are the last resort of privateering, has been postponed by the exceptional development of private philanthropy and its extension to fields and to tasks for which it is only just now proving itself also inadequate.

THE PATCHWORK OF PENSIONS DISCREDITED.

In one great department, however, where Government has had to meet a national responsibility, namely, in the relief of soldiers and sailors and their dependents, the patchwork of pensions in the United States since the Civil War, based on the principle of gratuities and political favor rather than on a sense of social justice and mutual obligation, is universally recognized as a failure. Pensions have developed in hundreds of thousands of citizens precisely the attitude of mind toward government which real democracies seek to dispel. If the collective wealth and power of the community become a prize which the individual seeks to control for his own benefit, no real democracy is possible. Only as we can cultivate the feeling on the part of every individual citizen that he can be stronger, freer, and happier in proportion as every other individual in the community is made stronger, more secure, and given larger opportunities for happiness will the foundations of democracy itself be safe and its fruits increase.

DEMOCRATIC REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENTS.

We are just starting upon a world enterprise which has for its ultimate goal the democratic reorganization of the world. In the preparation of the Nation for the war there is no more striking and significant proposal that goes to the roots of our own unpreparedness, and there is no more timely and important war measure which may well test our national spirit than the proposal to provide a scientific system of social insurance instead of pensions to carry as many as possible of the risks and sacrifices of military service.

With the national purpose to participate in this world struggle for democracy defined and determined by the people themselves expressing their will in accordance with democratic principles, the conscription of men for military service on a scientific and impartial plan designed to secure those best able to render such service has been the most heartening evidence of real democracy in this country and its greatest gain in a century.

LIGHTENING THE BURDENS OF DRAFTED MEN.

The response of the people to the draft law has abundantly vindicated American patriotism and the virility of the Nation. It could have been made much easier, aroused greater enthusiasm, and contributed to the building up of an even stronger national spirit had Congress at the time it passed the draft law also enacted the war insurance bill which it has now under consideration.

Every removable fear that may naturally enter into the mind of the man called upon to give his life in defense of his country should certainly be removed. The sacrifice of comfort and economic security can not be compensated for by any wage which the Government may pay its soldiers. The degrees of sacrifice are too varied and its economic value too great for that. The anxiety, however, which the man who goes to the front naturally feels lest those who are dependent upon him for support are left unprotected, can be removed. Provision can be made not only for as strong economic protection for the comfort and welfare of the soldier's family as his own earning power gave them before he went to war, but his personal economic status, to whatever extent his earning power may be impaired if not destroyed by his military service, may also be assured.

The sooner Congress enacts the war insurance bill and thereby removes unnecessary handicaps which inevitably deter patriotic men through fear of the economic readjustments it is necessary to make, the prompter and more ready will be the response to their country's call. The cost will be great, and the challenge to business ability in the management of a highly complicated and stupendous business undertaking will be even greater. If the conscription of wealth is likewise necessary to make effective the conscription of men it will have no greater justification in any expenditure that Congress is called upon to make than in supplying the huge sums needed for the compensation and insurance of the unavoidable risks which those who fight must take and which the man at home can in this way and will cheerfully share.

WHAT THE WAR INSURANCE BILL PROPOSES.

The bill to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department proposes to add to the existing bureau, which insures ships and seamen in the merchant marine against war risks, a new division of military and naval insurance, which will provide for three things:

- (1) Compulsory allotment of pay for support of dependents and for savings for future economic rehabilitation.
- (2) Compensation for death or injury, including disability due to disease.
- (3) Ability to get additional insurance at low cost.

THE ENLISTED MAN MUST HELP HIMSELF.

Every enlisted man in the military or naval forces of the United States must allot not to exceed one-half of his pay and not less than $15 per month for the benefit of his dependents, or, if he has no dependents, to be deposited to his credit for his own benefit as a capital fund, upon which the Government will pay interest and hold for him to enable him to make necessary economic readjustments after the expiration of his military service. To this compulsory allotment the enlisted man may add voluntarily from the half pay not subject to compulsory allotment and for purposes which he may choose. The Government will add a family allowance equal in amount to the monthly compulsory allotment and graded according to the relationship and number of dependents, but in no case does the Government allowance exceed $50 per month. This is payable from the time of enlistment to death in, or one month after discharge from, the service, but not for more than one month after the termination of the present war emergency. For the ordinary enlisted man, who receives $33 per month in foreign service, the minimum compulsory allotment might be $16.50, to which $16.50 would be added as a family allowance, thus giving his family a minimum income of $33 per month, which the man, however, might by further allotment easily increase to $50. He would have to give up only $8.50 of the other half of his pay. The Government would add another $8.50 and he would have $8 per month left, or sufficient for his own spending money.

COMPENSATION FOR DEATH OR DISABILITY.

Compensation for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the course of the service by any commissioned officer or enlisted man, or by any member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps composed of women. This compensation is graded like the compensation now provided for wage earners under workmen's compensation laws in 35 States, and under the Federal Government of the United States according to pay, and is made payable in monthly installments. It is not assignable and is exempt from taxation, attachments, and execution. It takes the place of any rights or expectations under pension laws and is expressly granted in lieu of pension. It is not operative for persons receiving service or retirement pay. The scale is a fairly liberal one and Congress, of course, may at any time make it more liberal, but presumably would do so only under general legislation for the entire service, thus precluding the inequalities and injustices of special pension legislation. Congress can not constitutionally bind future Congresses and prevent special pension legislation, but it can and in this law it seeks to create so fair, liberal, and satisfactory a system of meeting every just claim impersonally and as a matter of right that it will be practically impossible for any future Congress to consider a private pension bill and highly improbable that any soldier or his dependents would seek any other remedy than that provided for under this war compensation act.

INSURANCE OF INSURABILITY.

This is a novel, constructive, and at the same time perhaps the most contentious part of the new proposal. It is a departure from the accepted principles of industrial compensation legislation and from the practice of other countries in dealing with compensation for war risks, family allowances, and pensions. It is, however, vital and essential to a fair test of the proposal to which the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have given their unqualified indorsement and without which that plan can not be fairly tested. It is the feature which specially marks this measure as a forward looking experiment in social legislation. It is far-reaching and constructive and is a war measure in a real sense.

ADVANTAGES OF INSURANCE.

Americans are not laggards in their appreciation and use of the advantages of mutual insurance. A man fit for military service is physically the best insurable risk and can purchase insurance at the lowest commercial rate. The minute he shoulders a gun he either can not purchase insurance at all or only in a limited way at a very high and practically prohibitive rate. This bill proposes to stimulate and encourage every enlisted man to use his own resources and to make use of the facilities of insurance to protect and safeguard his interests to the limit of his resources. To do this it offers him ordinary term insurance renewable from year to year during the war and convertible at the end of the war without physical examination in such amounts as he chooses to take not to exceed $10,000, the Government agreeing to pay the difference between the cost of carrying such insurance while he is engaged in military service, estimated at about $58 per thousand, for the man of 21 years of age, and the rate which he would pay if he were not in military service, estimated at about $8 per thousand. He is given 120 days after enlistment in which to take out such amount of additional insurance as he may elect, and if he fails to exercise this privilege and dies or becomes totally disabled within this period he will be considered as insured and the benefit paid to his family.

The insurance is payable only in monthly installments to the beneficiary during life. The maximum amount of $10,000 is estimated to yield about $25 per month, which for the enlisted man when added to his compensation for death or disability as based on his rate of pay is none too liberal to maintain a decent standard of living for his family deprived of its breadwinner.

The insurance companies do not favor State insurance nor like the idea of the Government going into the insurance business. They appreciate, however, the advertising value for the insurance business in general of this feature of the war-insurance bill.

WHAT IT COSTS THE GOVERNMENT AND THE INSURED.

Without compulsion and without the importunities of insurance agents would the average man who needs it most take out this added insurance to any considerable extent? Could he afford to do so? Probably not more than $2,500 per man on the average would be written. In perfecting the details of the bill Congress may decide to limit the privilege of such subsidized insurance for officers and men whose rates of pay, or private resources, make the Government aid unnecessary. It may also decide to pay the full cost for certain amounts of such added insurance for those who can afford to take only small policies. The principle of the Government subsidy is, however, right and just. There is no discrimination at the expense of the insured taxpayer who pays the full commercial rate in favor of a class to whom we do not owe a greater debt than any subsidized insurance can possibly pay.

The cost to the Government, however great and however difficult to estimate exactly in advance, is sure to be less than that of any system of pensions and much fairer because proportionate to what the insured person has done for himself. The soldier who does nothing for himself must be content with what his compensation yields or depend on private charity. After rejecting or neglecting so liberal an opportunity as this provision for the insurance of his insurability offers he can not with good grace appeal to the Government for a pension.

A NEW CHANCE FOR THE INJURED.

An extremely interesting and valuable provision is made for injured persons who may through a process of reeducation, rehabilitation, and vocational training which the Government will provide, have their earning power restored. In cases of dismemberment or of injuries to sight or hearing and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability, persons may be required in lieu of compensation for the time being to enlist in a training branch of military and naval service entitling them to full pay as during the last month of their active service and to family allowance and allotments as in the regular service if while taking training for rehabilitation they are prevented from following any substantially gainful occupation. Any one failing so to enlist for training forfeits his right to compensation until he does so.

A MEASURE DEVISED BY EXPERTS.

Congress has had able assistance in framing its war insurance act. The plan is in a new and important sense an administration measure. The Secretary of the Treasury very properly considered it a financial measure of the greatest importance and has given it disinterested and able leadership. He called to his assistance not only experts in insurance and the representatives of all the leading insurance companies in this country whose patriotic cooperation he has secured, but he has also had the active help and support of influential labor leaders like Mr. Samuel Gompers and Mr. J. W. Sullivan, of socially minded economists, lawyers, and persons expert in dealing with the problems of dependency, like Judge Julian W. Mack, who has given his time freely as chairman of a committee that drafted the bill and worked out the details of the plan; of Dr. Leo S. Rowe, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Capt. S. H. Wolfe, a well-known accountant and actuary; Miss Julia C. Lathrop, of the Children's Bureau; Mr. V. Everit Macy, president of the National Civic Federation; Profs. Henry R. Seager and Thomas I. Parkinson, of Columbia University, and the staff of the legislative drafting research fund of Columbia University.

WHAT OTHER COUNTRIES ARE DOING.

The experience of other countries in providing for the dependents of enlisted men has been carefully studied by the Children's Bureau. Much of it has been put in evidence by Miss Lathrop at the House hearings on the bill, many features of which are frankly based on this experience. That of Canada where conditions are more analogous to our own is described by Capt. Wolfe in a publication of the Children's Bureau.

NEED FOR PROMPT ACTION.

Congress should act promptly on the war insurance measure, even though its Members are weary from the arduous labors of a long and momentous extra session. Our laws dealing with problems of dependency in soldiers' families in time of war lack many modern provisions and tendencies which a comparison with those of European countries reveal. It is time that they were modernized. The war insurance bill will do that and give the United States a measure which will put it in the first rank and ought to be part of the contract between our Government and our new National Army.

Mr. SIEGEL. Whatever defects this bill possesses at the present time will be eradicated when the final vote has been reached.

I had hoped to see a more liberal policy adopted, but I shall vote for it, realizing that its enactment is a step in the proper direction and the most progressive piece of legislation that Congress has enacted during the past 25 years. Future generations will recognize that fact and point to it with pride and admiration. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill that has not been discussed in the general debate that I should like to have the attention of the members of the committee on, and that is the feature that pertains to the rehabilitation or the reeducation of the boys who will return crippled.

The bill has been written with a view that there will be many not to return, and the compensation is allowed for those who would be their dependents. This feature is the one that appeals to me even more than that one, because that feature will most certainly be carried into law and justified by everyone.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the committee is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen in the aisle will please be seated. Gentlemen will cease conversation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, we are considering one of the most important measures that has been under consideration in this House in a quarter of a century. It reaches further than anyone here has intimated in any discussion had upon it. Therefore I make the point of order that the House is not in order—those who are here—and that there is not a quorum here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that a moment while I make a suggestion?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will, for a mere suggestion.

Mr. ADAMSON. My suggestion is this: If we change this general debate to debate under the five-minute rule and make the practice just as liberal as the gentleman would wish, we shall have an audience here; and if the gentleman will agree now, this evening, to close general debate on Monday, we will have a full committee then, and I am willing to have the most liberal practice under the rule.

Mr. ESCH. I think, Mr. Chairman, this side has still an hour to its credit.

Mr. ADAMSON. You can have it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ESCH. And they desire to speak in general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. All the gentlemen that I have conferred with on this side prefer to make their speeches to a better audience. They prefer to speak under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen on the list who wish to speak in general debate can have the option of speaking under the five-minute rule, I have no objection to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I stated to the gentleman in charge of the bill this morning, in the temporary absence of the chairman of the committee, that I would prefer to take the half hour allotted to me in a discussion of a motion directed against a particular part of the bill rather than to discuss the matter in general debate, and I rather agree that we can get a more intelligent discussion and consideration of this bill in the manner the Chairman of the committee has suggested.

Mr. ADAMSON. I can promise there will be no complaint as to treatment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. So far as I am concerned, I will agree to that, if the gentleman from Georgia will move that the committee rise at this time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that at this time the time at the disposal of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is about an hour.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; about an hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And that much time shall be given under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Georgia state their requests.

Mr. MADDEN. I had an hour allotted to me.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then it is understood, Mr. Chairman, that the general debate is closed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Ohio shall have it if he prefers it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FESS. All right.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then it is understood that the general debate is closed.

Mr. MADDEN. It is understood that the general debate is closed, with the further understanding that gentlemen wishing to discuss the bill in its various stages of consideration shall not be confined to the five-minute rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. You shall have your time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would it not be well to read the first section of the bill and then have an agreement that there should be an hour and a half on that section, an hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]?

Mr. MADDEN. That would not meet the case. For example, I have had an hour's time allotted to me on the bill, which I was going to use in general debate; but my intention was to discuss the merits of the various phases of the bill. But with the attendance here this afternoon I do not care to do that.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman can select his own time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Various times?

Mr. ADAMSON. We will agree to that.

Mr. FESS. I was discussing a particular phase, the rehabilitation.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman shall have his time.

Mr. FESS. I am not opposed to the bill, but I wanted to speak on this particular section of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. You should have a better audience.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us read the first section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I shall move that the committee rise.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I think we should have the membership of the House here. So far as I am concerned, I do not object to considering the general debate concluded now.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, if it is understood that the general debate is ended, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ESCH. Under the agreement made?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; Under the agreement made.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia state the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is a gentleman's agreement.

Mr. ADAMSON. On Monday all the gentlemen shall have the right to speak under the five-minute rule and occupy the time promised them in general debate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a letter from Judge Julian W. Mack to Col. Theodore Roosevelt, dated August 18, 1917, relating to this bill, and Col. Roosevelt's answer thereto, indorsing the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Have you Democrats come to the conclusion now that Col. Roosevelt's opinion is worth something? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by inserting the letters referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 18, 1917.

MY DEAR COL. ROOSEVELT: I call your attention to a bill that has just been introduced in Congress by Senator SIMMONS and Representative ALEXANDER, in the drafting of which I was privileged to participate.

The object of the bill is to have our Government grant to the fighting forces, as a matter of justice and not of charity, compensation for the losses that may be incurred by them and indemnity against the risks imposed upon them by drafting them for war service.

Following the example of our allies, the bill compels men to contribute to the support of their families, but to that contribution the Government adds a substantial grant of from fifteen to fifty dollars a month.

As compensation is now given to civil Government employees, so the bill proposes to give compensation instead of a pension to the military employees for death or disability resulting from the service. The family, however, not the man, is the unit on which the amount of the grant is based. The compensation for a totally disabled private is from forty to seventy-five dollars a month and in case of his death from thirty to sixty a month, in each case dependent upon the size of his family.

More important than this, however, is the reeducation and rehabilitation of the maimed or crippled man. To develop every latent power within him, to save him from the danger of resting with a bare Government grant, and thereby losing all stamina and zest for life, every man who is fit for work must undergo a course of training under penalty of suspension of his compensation. On the other hand, to spur him on to the utmost, he will not be deprived of his compensation if he raise himself to a high economic level.

The men enlisted in this great national service can not protect themselves as the rest of us can by insurance against old age, disability, or death except at a prohibitive price. The bill, therefore, plans that the Government itself shall issue such insurance and shall issue it at net cost based upon mortality in peace times. The extra cost, due to the heavier death rate during the war, is a burden that should be borne not by the fighting men but by the Government for which they are fighting. On this plan the average premium for the young man will be about $8 a year per thousand. Practically every private can contribute at least $15 monthly out of his $33 pay to the support of his family, $7 monthly as premium on $10,000 (the maximum) insurance, and have left sufficient spending money for the man at the front.

And through this insurance the men are enabled, in accordance with the soundest American traditions, to protect themselves. There will be no need of a service pension for them.

I feel sure that the fundamental principles of the bill will evoke your deepest sympathy, and I hope that after a study of the measure you will want to give it your hearty support.

Very sincerely, yours,

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Oyster Bay, N. Y.

JULIAN W. MACK.

OYSTER BAY, N. Y., August 22, 1917.

MY DEAR JUDGE MACK: I have read the bill for compensating and insuring the soldiers and sailors with the keenest interest. It marks a great step forward. It puts the United States where it ought to be, as standing in the forefront among the nations in doing justice to our defenders.

I am particularly struck by the emphasis on the family instead of, as heretofore, on the man. When we draft men into public service we enlist their dependents, and of these we must never lose sight. They must be cared for while their breadwinner is away. They, not he alone, must be considered in fixing the compensation for disability; and if he dies as a result of the service they must be adequately protected, instead of being given the miserable pittance that the present pension laws provide.

But I particularly like the provisions for reeducation. There is great danger when a man knows that for the rest of his life the Government is going to give him just enough to live on that he will be content therewith and grow sluggishly indifferent to further effort. But life is not static. Men go forward or else they fall backward. Unless proper steps are taken men who endure first terrible injuries and then the long inactivity that necessarily follows, and who suffer some degree of permanent disability in consequence, are in grave danger of going to pieces. It is clearly in the public interest, as well as for their own good, that they should be reeducated for life wherever possible; and it is both wise and just that their economic recuperation should not lessen their compensation for loss of limb. We shall be recant, indeed, if we fall short of the achievements which stand to the credit of France and Canada and England in the reeducation of their disabled. And we shall certainly fail in this indispensable duty of human salvage if we do not begin now.

The compensation for the family should not be based upon the family's status at the time when the injury is incurred. These young men of from 21 to 31, even though they be crippled, ought to marry; and the wife thus married after the war and the children born to them deserve the same treatment and consideration as those whom the husband has left in order to go to the war. There are, however, some serious dangers that might well be guarded against by limiting the time of such marriages, where the wife is to be compensated, to 10, or at the outside 15, years after the war.

The compensation for the family should be so arranged as to put a premium on the soldier having a considerable number of children; his is the stock which the Nation can not permit to die out.

Of course, when the Government takes away the insurability of the man it ought to give him a substitute, and Government insurance, as outlined in the bill, is the only substitute. We must not be led off on a red-herring trail by the argument that the proposed bill opens the door to the Government's eventual assumption of the insurance business. It is nothing short of criminal to fail in the adoption of legislation necessary to the effective conduct of the war through fear of such legislation in times of peace. The old-line insurance companies and the fraternal orders should welcome this new move in social progress. In the interest of their policyholders they can not and ought not to stand the cost of the war risk except to the extent that they are now obligated. The Government can and ought to do it; and when the insurance is granted it must be kept in force for these men at rock-bottom rates after as well as during the war.

The bill is a real and constructive measure. I believe it should be passed and should go into effect when the first men of the new National Army are called out. I know of nothing more important than to lift the fears of men that their families may become objects of charity and to hearten the wives and children and parents of this country to respond bravely and gladly to the Nation's call.

European experience constantly reminds us that the present war, if we are to participate in it effectively, calls for the organization of the Nation as a whole. The civil population as well as the military must be put on a war basis. Without a sound morale among those at home there can be no sound morale of those at the front. The proposed bill embodies the measures which we must take, and take at once, if those who fight and those who are left behind are to have that sense of confidence and those safeguards for the maintenance of a family life which alone will assure the right kind of fighting force abroad and necessary exertions at home. Your bill is a war measure in the truest sense of the word, and I shall gladly and heartily do all I can in its support.

Very sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,

Hon. JULIAN W. MACK,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PURCHASE AND MANUFACTURE OF ORDNANCE AND AMMUNITION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following committee under the resolution passed this morning providing for the investigation of the manufacture and purchase of ordnance and ammunition: Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, Mr. FESS, Mr. GORDON, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. MCKENZIE, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, and Mr. MORIN. The reason why the Chair does not appoint the leading Republican on the committee [Mr. KAHN] is because he wants to go off and rest up a little.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute, to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the report in the Washington Post for this morning of the proceedings of Congress yesterday it is stated that the resolution called up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] to provide for the appointment of additional chaplains in the Army and to include Jewish rabbis was halted by an objection made by Representative BORLAND. That is a mistake. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD correctly states that the objection was made by another Member. As a matter of fact, I am a supporter of that resolution, and was not the Member who made the objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., September 8, 1917.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am requested by my colleague Hon. BRUCE F. STERLING, to ask that he be given a 10 days' leave of absence on account of the sudden death of his brother.

Very respectfully,

GUY E. CAMPBELL.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this leave will be granted. There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—NAVY YARDS AND NAVAL STATIONS.

By unanimous consent the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of House Document No. 339, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commission on Navy Yards and Naval Stations, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOOR OF MEETING MONDAY—11 A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 11 o'clock a. m. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, September 10, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the chairman of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for salaries and expenses of the commission for the service of the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 360), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 5988) giving rank, pay, and allowance to district superintendents of the United States Coast Guard; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 5989) to grant certain lands to the town of Olathe, Colo., for the protection of its water supply; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. McCLINTIC: Resolution (H. Res. 135) authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to call on certain departments of the Government for the names of male employees between the ages of 21 and 31 who have accepted service at a salary of $1 per year; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 5990) granting an increase of pension to Addison Blaine; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DENISON: A bill (H. R. 5991) granting an increase of pension to Aaron Hart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5992) granting a pension to Elbert M. Lewis; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Resolutions of Sons and Daughters of Liberty of Silver Star Council, of Newark, Ohio, and Pride Council, of Mansfield, Ohio, in favor of Senate joint resolution 84; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BROWNING: Petition of Thorofare Grange, No. 59, Thorofare, N. J., consisting of 150 members, praying that the Government of the United States import nitrate of soda and sell same to farmers and fertilizer trade at a reasonable price, thus to cheapen all forms of ammoniates, and hence all fertilizers, to the end that farmers will plant and produce a maximum crop in 1918; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: Petition of J. B. Lawrence, J. B. Edwards, and 75 other citizens of the sixth Alabama congressional district, asking for the repeal of the conscription law and favoring peace negotiations; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of Daughters of Liberty, Ilion, N. Y., asking for moral protection of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TEMPLETON: Petition of the Slocum Council, No. 271, Junior Order American Mechanics, Pittston, Pa.; and the Dallas Council, No. 281, Junior Order American Mechanics, Dallas, Pa., favoring immigration restriction; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the Nescopee Tribe, No. 132, Improved Order of Red Men, Luzerne, Pa., favoring Senate joint resolution 84; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 10, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2785) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Waterways Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock and dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT (for Mr. GALLINGER):

A bill (S. 2855) granting an increase of pension to George W. Hall (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2856) granting a pension to Sarah Smith; and

A bill (S. 2857) granting a pension to Carrie L. Rouse (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2858) to defray expenses incurred by officers and enlisted men of foreign armies attached to the Army of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $886,389.68 to pay the judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the State of Massachusetts for premiums paid for coin with which to pay bonds issued for moneys borrowed and used to furnish State troops, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $350,000 for the enlargement and reclamation of Fort Taylor, Key West, Fla., etc., intended to be proposed to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADDRESS BY HON. THOMAS W. HARDWICK.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the address delivered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] before the American Bar Association at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., September 5, 1917, on the subject of the rights of the States in interstate commerce be printed as a public document. I ask that the motion and the address be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by former Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Hon. Charles E. Hughes, upon the fighting powers of the United States under the Constitution, before the American Bar Association at Saratoga last week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

THE FIGHTING POWERS OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

"THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION DID NOT CONTRIVE AN IMPOSING SPECTACLE OF IMPOTENCY—WE ARE MAKING WAR AS A NATION ORGANIZED UNDER THE CONSTITUTION * * * A NATION WHICH COULD NOT FIGHT WOULD BE POWERLESS TO SECURE 'THE BLESSINGS OF LIBERTY TO OURSELVES AND OUR POSTERITY.'"

[Address of Charles E. Hughes, former Justice of the Supreme Court, before the American Bar Association.]

Before the American Bar Association, convened in annual session at Saratoga, Charles Evans Hughes, former Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, on Wednesday delivered an address on "War powers under the Constitution." It was an occasion eminently fitting for such an address, and Mr. Hughes, perhaps better than any other in the distinguished and learned assemblage, because of the fullness of his experience on the bench of the court which gives interpretation to the Constitution, was the man to invest the subject with the touch of authority.

"The power to wage war," said the former justice, "is the power to wage war successfully," for "a nation which could not fight would be powerless to secure 'the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.' Thus the framers of the Constitution 'did not contrive an imposing spectacle of impotency,' but in the unusual circumstances of war a 'fighting Constitution.'"

Mr. Hughes's address in full follows:

"In the unusual circumstances of war it is natural that there should be some confusion with respect to the constitutional warrant for extraordinary action taken or contemplated. Some altogether misconceive the Constitution. Others vaguely fear that we are serving temporary exigency at the expense of our fundamental law, and that we are thus breeding a lawless Constitution-ignoring spirit which is a serious menace to our future. Others seek to raise doubts of power in order to embarrass the prosecution of the war. And there seem to be still others who in their zeal impatiently and without thought put the Constitution aside as having no relation to these times.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN WAR.

"While we are at war we are not in revolution. We are making war as a Nation organized under the Constitution, from which the established national authorities derive all their powers either in war or in peace. The Constitution is as effective to-day as it ever was and the oath to support it is just as binding. But the framers of the Constitution did not contrive an imposing spectacle of impotency. One of the objects of 'a more perfect Union' was 'to provide for the common defense.' A nation which could not fight would be powerless to secure the 'blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.' Self-preservation is the first law of national life, and the Constitution itself provides the necessary powers in order to defend and preserve the United States. Otherwise, as Mr. Justice Story said, 'the country would be in danger of losing both its liberty and its sovereignty from its dread of investing the public councils with the power of defending it. It would be more willing to submit to foreign conquest than to domestic rule.'

DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS.

"The war powers under the Constitution are carefully distributed. To Congress is given the power 'to declare war.' The proposal to add 'to make peace' found no favor, as this was deemed to belong to the treaty-making power vested in the President and the Senate. To the President was given the direction of war as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It was not in the contemplation of the Constitution that the command of forces and the conduct of campaigns should be in charge of a council or that as to this there should be a division of authority or responsibility. The prosecution of war demands in the highest degree the promptness, directness, and unity of action in military operations which alone can proceed from the Executive. This exclusive power to command the Army and Navy, and thus to direct and control campaigns, exhibits not autocracy but democracy fighting effectively through its chosen instruments and in accordance with the established organic law.

PLENARY POWER TO WAGE WAR.

"While the President is Commander in Chief, in the Congress resides the authority 'to raise and support armies' and 'to provide and maintain a navy' and 'to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces,' and as a safeguard against military domination the power to raise and support armies is qualified by the provision that 'no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.' Otherwise, this power is unlimited. The Congress is to prescribe the military organization and provide the military establishment, fix numbers, regulate equipment, afford maintenance, and for these purposes appropriate such amounts of money as it thinks necessary.

POWER TO PASS CONSCRIPTION LAWS.

"Upon every citizen lies the duty of aiding in the common defense. In exercising its constitutional power to raise armies the Congress may enforce this duty. The Congress may call any one to service who is able to serve. The question who may be called, or in what order, is simply one for the judgment of the National Legislature. The power vested in Congress is not to raise armies simply by calling for volunteers, but to raise armies by whatever method Congress deems best, and hence must be deemed to embrace conscription. To the framers of the Constitution the draft was a familiar mode of raising armies, as it had been resorted to by the colonies to fill up their quotas in the Revolutionary War. It is true that the proposal, in 1814, of Monroe, as Secretary of War, to resort to conscription was vigorously opposed as unconstitutional. But the draft was put in force both by the Union and by the Confederacy during the Civil War and its validity was sustained by the courts in both North and South. 'The power of coercing the citizen,' said Judge Robertson, of Virginia, in Burrough v. Peyton (16 Gratt., 470 (1864)), 'to render military service is indeed a transcendent power in the hands of any government; but, so far from being inconsistent with liberty, it is essential to its preservation.'

LINCOLN'S OPINION.

"Permit me to quote upon this question the opinion prepared (although not published) by President Lincoln, which sets forth admirably the grounds for sustaining the power of Congress to pass a conscription act:

"In this case, those who desire the rebellion to succeed, and others who seek reward in a different way, are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments. They tell us the law is unconstitutional. It is the first instance, I believe, in which the power of Congress to do a thing has ever been questioned in a case when the power is given by the Constitution in express terms. Whether a power can be implied when it is not expressed has often been the subject of controversy, but this is the first case in which the degree of effrontery has been ventured upon of denying a power which is plainly and distinctly written down in the Constitution. The Constitution declares that 'the Congress shall have power . . . to raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.' The whole scope of the conscription act is 'to raise and support armies.' There is nothing else in it. . . . Do you admit that the power is given to raise and support armies, and yet insist that by this act Congress has not exercised the power in a constitutional mode, has not done the thing in the right way? Who is to judge of this? The Constitution gives Congress the power, but it does not prescribe the mode or expressly declare who shall prescribe it. In such case Congress must prescribe the mode or relinquish the power. There is no alternative. . . . The power is given fully, completely, unconditionally. It is not a power to raise armies if State authorities consent; nor if the men to compose the armies are entirely willing, but it is a power to raise and support armies given to Congress by the Constitution without an 'if.' . . . The principle of the draft, which simply is involuntary or enforced service, is not new. It has been practiced in all ages of the world. It was well known to the framers of our Constitution as one of the modes of raising armies, at the time they placed in that instrument the provision that 'the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies.' . . . Wherein is the peculiar hardship now? Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free Government which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed once to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of the race run out?"

"These are the words of Lincoln, penned in the midst of the Civil War, in which conscription was enforced, and his reasoning is conclusive. And while the question was not presented to the United States Supreme Court, the power of Congress was explicitly recognized in Tarble's case (13 Wall., p. 407, and in later opinions).

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

"The constitutional authority thus vested in Congress is not limited by any qualification arising from religious beliefs or conscientious objections. These are matters not affecting power, but policy. As Mr. Justice Harlan said, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Jacobson v. Massachusetts (197 U. S., p. 29), one 'may be compelled, by force, if need be, against his will and without regard to his personal wishes or his pecuniary interests, or even his religious or political convictions, to take his place in the ranks of the army of his country, and risk the chance of being shot down in its defense.' It is, however, in my judgment, a sound policy on the part of Congress to provide for the discharge from the draft of conscientious objectors. Nothing, I believe, is gained for the country by overriding the claims of conscience in such cases; but it is obviously necessary that there should be such definitions and restrictions as will prevent imposture and evasion by those who have as little conscience as they have stomach for war.

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT.

"It is now contended in some quarters that this power, which undoubtedly Congress had, has been restricted or abolished by the thirteenth amendment, which was adopted after the close of the Civil War. This amendment provides that 'Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.' It has been said by the United States Supreme Court that the plain intention 'was to abolish slavery of whatever name and form and all its badges and incidents; to render impossible any state of bondage; to make labor free by prohibiting that control by which the personal service of one man is disposed of or coerced for another's benefit, which is the essence of involuntary servitude.' It hits not only slavery but peonage. But the language of the amendment was not new. It reproduced the historic words of the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory, and its terms, construed in the light of its history and plain purpose, afford no basis whatever for the conclusion that it interfered in the slightest degree with the power of Congress to raise and support armies.

"In the case of Robertson v. Baldwin (165 U. S., p. 275) it was argued that the thirteenth amendment invalidated certain provisions of the Revised Statutes authorizing justices of the peace to issue warrants for deserting seamen. In denying the claim the court said: 'It is clear, however, that the amendment was not intended to introduce any novel doctrine with respect to certain descriptions of service which have always been treated as exceptions, such as military and naval enlistments.' The soldier drafted under the act of Congress is performing the duty which he owes of aiding in the common defense, and the constitutional amendment contemplates no escape from the duty to defend and preserve the United States.

POWER OVER THE MILITIA.

"The power to 'raise and support armies' should not be confused with the power given to Congress 'to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions'; and 'to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.' The President is Commander in Chief not only of 'the Army and Navy of the United States,' but also 'of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.'

"The militia, within the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution, is distinct from the Army of the United States. 'Remember always,' said Daniel Webster, 'that the great principle of the Constitution on that subject is that the militia is the militia of the States, and not of the General Government; and being thus the militia of the States, there is no part of the Constitution worded with greater care, and with a more scrupulous jealousy than that which grants and limits the power of Congress over it.'

"In order to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection and to repel invasions, it would be necessary to employ regular troops or to employ the militia. And the power given to Congress with respect to the militia was manifestly to make a large standing army unnecessary. But as the service of the Organized Militia can only be required by the National Government for the limited purposes specified in the Constitution, it follows (as Attorney General Wickersham advised President Taft) that the Organized Militia, as such, can not be employed for offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States.

MAY SEND ARMY ABROAD.

"This, however, is apart from the power of Congress to raise and support a Federal Army. Congress may be content with a small standing army in ordinary times, but Congress may create and equip such army as it pleases, subject to the qualification with respect to appropriations. It can equip an army in preparation for war, and of course, it may furnish whatever army is required for the prosecution of war. The organization and service of an army raised by Congress are not subject to the limitations governing its control of the militia. The power to use an army is coextensive with the power to make war; and the army may be used wherever the war is carried on, here or elsewhere. There is no limitation upon the authority of Congress to create an army, and it is for the President as Commander in Chief to direct the campaigns of that army wherever he may think they should be carried on. As Chief Justice Taney, speaking for the Supreme Court in Fleming v. Page (9 How., p. 615), said:

"As Commander in Chief he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command, and to employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy. He may invade the hostile country and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States.

"We employed our arms in Canada in the War of 1812; our troops were again sent to foreign soil in the Mexican War and in the War with Spain, and more recently have been employed in China and Mexico. There is no doubt of the constitutional authority to employ our forces on the battle fields of Europe in the war that we are now waging for the safety of the United States and to conquer an enduring peace that the liberties of free peoples throughout the world may forever be secure from the aggressions of unscrupulous military power.

POWER TO WAGE WAR SUCCESSFULLY.

"The power to wage war is the power to wage war successfully. The framers of the Constitution were under no illusions as to war. They had emerged from a long struggle which had taught them the weakness of a mere confederation, and they had no hope that they could hold what they had won save as they established a Union which could fight with the strength of one people under one government intrusted with the common defense. In equipping the National Government with the needed authority in war they tolerated no limitations inconsistent with that object, as they realized that the very existence of the Nation might be at stake and that every resource of the people must be at command. Said Madison in the Federalist: 'Security against foreign danger is one of the primitive objects of civil society. It is an avowed and essential object of the American Union. The powers requisite for attaining it must be effectually confided to the Federal councils.' And Hamilton said: 'The idea of restraining the legislative authority, in the means of providing for the national defense, is one of those refinements which owe their origin to a zeal for liberty more ardent than enlightened.' He again emphasizes the same idea in these words: 'The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite, and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed. This power ought to be coextensive with all the possible combinations of such circumstances, and ought to be under the direction of the same councils which are appointed to preside over the common defense.'

"It was in this view that plenary power was given to Congress to wage war and raise armies. It is also in the light of this conception of national exigencies that we must read subdivision 18 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution (following the enumeration of powers), which gives Congress the authority 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.' It must also be remembered that it is of the essence of national power that where it exists it dominates. There is no room in our scheme of government for the assertion of State power in hostility to the authorized exercise of Federal power. The power of the National Government to carry on war is explicit and supreme, and the authority thus resides in Congress to make all laws which are needed for that purpose; that is, to Congress in the event of war is confided the power to enact whatever legislation is necessary to prosecute the war with vigor and success, and this power is to be exercised without impairment of the authority committed to the President as Commander in Chief to direct military operations.

POWER OF THE PRESIDENT.

"Each of these powers, that of Congress and of the President, is the subject of a distinct grant; each is the complement of the other, and together they furnish the adequate equipment of authority for war. There is no more impressive spectacle than that of the President of the Republic in time of war when, in addition to the other great powers of his office, he acts in supreme command of the armed forces of the Nation and conducts its military campaigns. It was under this power that President Lincoln defended the proclamation of emancipation. It related to those held as slaves in the States in rebellion, and he regarded it, as it recited, as a necessary act of war within his authority as Commander in Chief. He thus expressed this point of view:

"You say it is unconstitutional. I think differently. I think the Constitution invests its Commander in Chief with the law of war in time of war. The most that can be said—is so much—is that slaves are property. Is there—has there ever been—any question that by the law of war, property, both of enemies and friends, may be taken when needed? And is it not needed whenever taking it helps us or hurts the enemy? Armies, the world over, destroy enemies' property when they can not use it, and even destroy their own to keep it from the enemy.

"It is also to be observed that the power exercised by the President in time of war is greatly augmented outside of his functions as Commander in Chief through legislation of Congress increasing his administrative authority. War demands the highest degree of efficient organization, and Congress, in the nature of things, can not prescribe many important details as it legislates for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of war. Never is adaptation of legislation to practical ends so urgently required, and hence Congress naturally in very large measure confers upon the President the authority to ascertain and determine various states of fact to which legislative measures are addressed. Further, a wide range of provisions relating to the organization and government of the Army and Navy which Congress might enact if it saw fit, it authorizes the President to prescribe. The principles governing the delegation of legislative power are clear, and, while they are of the utmost importance when properly applied, they are not such as to make the appropriate exercise of legislative power impracticable. 'The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation. Congress can not be permitted to abandon to others its proper legislative functions; but in time of war, when legislation must be adapted to many situations of the utmost complexity, which must be dealt with effectively and promptly, there is special need for flexibility and for every resource of practicality, and of course whether the limits of permissible delegation are in any case overstepped always remains a judicial question. We thus not only find these great war powers conferred upon the Congress and the President, respectively, but also a vast increase of administrative authority through legislative action springing from the necessities of war.

OTHER PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION—TAXING POWER.

"The question remains: What may be deemed to be the force and effect in time of war of the restrictive provisions contained in the Constitution with respect to the exercise of Federal authority? It is manifest at once that the great organs of the National Government retain and perform their functions as the Constitution prescribes. Senators and Representatives are qualified and chosen as provided in the Constitution, and the legislative power vested in the Congress must be exercised in the required manner. The President is still the constitutional Executive, elected in the manner provided and subject to the restraints imposed upon his office. The judicial power of the United States continues to be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress has ordained. Again, apart from the provisions fixing the framework of the Government, there are limitations which, by reason of their express terms or by necessary implication, must be regarded as applicable as well in war as in peace. Thus one of the expressed objects of the power granted to Congress 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises' is to 'provide for the common defense'; and it can not be doubted that taxes laid for this purpose—that is, to support the Army and Navy and to provide the means for military operations—must be laid subject to the constitutional restrictions. That is, all duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform throughout the United States, and direct taxes must be apportioned among the States according to population. And by the sixteenth amendment, providing that income taxes, from whatever source derived, may be laid without apportionment among the States, these taxes fall into the great class of excise duties and imposts and are alike subject to the rule requiring geographical uniformity, a requirement operative in war as well as in peace.

TREASON.

"The provisions as to treason are also clearly applicable in war:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort—

"And—

"the Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.

FIFTH AND SIXTH AMENDMENTS.

"But what shall be said of the efficacy in time of war of the great guaranties of personal and property rights? It would be impossible on this occasion to discuss comprehensively this important subject, or even to refer to all these guaranties, but we may briefly touch upon the question in its relation to the fifth and sixth amendments, viz:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

"Clearly these amendments, normally and perfectly adapted to conditions of peace, do not have the same complete and universal application in time of war. Thus the fifth amendment normally gives its protection to 'any person.' But in war this must yield to the undoubted national power to capture and confiscate the property of enemies. This was distinctly ruled by the Supreme Court in Miller v. United States (11 Wall., p. 268), a proceeding brought under the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862 to confiscate shares of stock owned by Miller, a Virginian, in a Michigan corporation. The court said:

"If the act of 1861 and the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 17, 1862, were municipal regulations only, there would be force in the objection that Congress has disregarded the restrictions of the fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution. * * * If, on the contrary, they are an exercise of the war powers of the Government, it is clear that they are not affected by the restrictions imposed by the fifth and sixth amendments. This we understand to have been conceded in the argument. The question, therefore, is whether the action of Congress was a legitimate exercise of the war power. The Constitution confers upon Congress expressly power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules respecting captures on land and water. Upon the exercise of these powers no restrictions are imposed. Of course, the power to declare war involves the power to prosecute it by all means and in any manner in which war may be legitimately prosecuted. It therefore includes the right to seize and confiscate all property of an enemy and to dispose of it at the will of the captor. This is and always has been an undoubted belligerent right.

MARTIAL LAW.

"Again, in the place where actual military operations are being conducted the ordinary rights of citizens must yield to paramount military necessity. This was conceded in Milligan's case (4 Wall., p. 127), where it was said in the prevailing opinion:

"If in foreign invasion or civil war the courts are actually closed and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theater of actual military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority thus overthrown to preserve the safety of the army and society; and as no power is left but the military, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course.

A different question, however, is presented with respect to the rights of citizens and others not enemies in places which are outside the actual theater of war. It was upon the question of the power of Congress to provide for the trial of citizens by military commission in such places that the justices sharply divided in the noted case of Milligan. He was a citizen of Indiana who had been tried by a military commission at Indianapolis on a charge of aiding the enemy and conspiring against the Government and had been sentenced to be hung. He was not a resident of one of the rebellious States nor a prisoner of war, and he had not been in the military or naval service. The court was unanimous in the opinion that under the terms of the act of Congress creating the commission it had no jurisdiction. But the majority of the court went further and declared that Congress was without power to provide for the trial of citizens by military commissions save in the locality of actual war and when there was no access to the courts. Maintaining with eloquent emphasis the guarantees of freedom contained in the fifth and sixth amendments, the majority of the court asserted that—

"Martial law can not arise from a threatened invasion. The necessity must be actual and present, the invasion real, such as effectually closes the courts and deposes the civil administration. * * * Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war.

"The minority of four justices, led by Chief Justice Chase, while agreeing that there was no jurisdiction in Milligan's case under the act of Congress, strongly insisted that Congress in time of war had the power to provide for the punishment of citizens charged with conspiracy against the United States by military tribunals, if it was deemed necessary for the public safety. Deducting this view from the war powers conferred by the Constitution, the Chief Justice said:

"Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is that when the Nation is involved in war and some portions of the country are invaded and all are exposed to invasion, it is within the power of Congress to determine to what States or districts such great and imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offenses against the discipline or security of the Army or against the public safety. * * * The fact that the Federal courts were open was regarded by Congress as a sufficient reason for not exercising the power; but that fact could not deprive Congress of the right to exercise it. These courts might be open and undisturbed in the execution of their functions and yet wholly incompetent to avoid threatened danger, or to punish with adequate promptitude and certainty the guilty conspirators. * * * In times of rebellion and civil war it may often happen, indeed, that judges and marshals will be in active sympathy with the rebels and courts their most efficient allies. * * * It was for Congress to determine the question of expediency.

"Prof. Willoughby, in a careful review of the Milligan case, regards the doctrine of the majority as essentially sound, that the necessity justifying martial law may not be created by legislative fiat. But he suggests that the majority went too far in the absolute declaration that martial law can not arise from 'a threatened invasion,' and that the mere fact that the courts are open, regardless of all other conditions, is a conclusive test. 'The better doctrine,' says Willoughby, 'is not for the courts to attempt to determine in advance with respect to any one element what does, what does not, create a necessity for martial law, but, as in all other cases of the exercise of official authority, to test the legality of an act by its special circumstances.

"Certainly, the test should not be a mere physical one, nor should substance be sacrificed to form. The majority recognized 'a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority,' when overthrown, in order 'to preserve the safety of the Army and society.' If this necessity actually exists it can not be doubted that the power of the Nation is adequate to meet it, but the rights of the citizen may not be impaired by an arbitrary legislative declaration. Outside the actual theater of war, and if, in a true sense, the administration of justice remains unobstructed, the right of the citizen to normal judicial procedure is secure.

CITIZEN'S RIGHTS OF PROPERTY.

"Further, with respect to the citizen's rights of property, a distinction may be taken between the unavoidable deprivations which take place where the conflict rages and those takings, although for military purposes, which are deliberate appropriations for which compensations must be made. As was said by the Supreme Court in United States v. Russell (13 Wall, 623):

"Private property, the Constitution provides, shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. * * * Extraordinary and unforeseen occasions arise, beyond all doubt, in cases of extreme necessity in time of war or of immediate and impending public danger in which private property may be impressed into the public service or may be seized or appropriated to the public use, or may even be destroyed without the consent of the owner. * * * Where such an extraordinary and unforeseen emergency occurs in the public service in time of war no doubt is entertained that the power of the Government is ample to supply for the moment the public wants in that way to the extent of the immediate public exigency, but the public danger must be immediate, imminent, and impending, and the emergency in the public service must be extreme and imperative and such as will not admit of delay or a resort to any other source of supply. * * * Such a justification may be shown, and when shown the rule is well settled that the officer taking private property for such a purpose, if the emergency is fully proved, is not a trespasser, and that the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner.

REASONABLE REGULATIONS TO INSURE SUCCESS IN WAR.

"Distinct from such requisitions from individuals is the necessary regulation of the use of property to secure the successful prosecution of the war. We are witnessing a new phase of the exercise of war powers. But the applicable principle to determine the validity of such action is not new. Even in times of peace we are familiar with the principle of regulation which extends to callings 'affected with a public interest.' The Supreme Court, after reviewing the decisions, recently said:

"They demonstrate that a business, by circumstances and its nature, may arise from private to be a public concern, and be subject, in consequence, to governmental regulation. And they demonstrate * * * that the attempts made to place the right of public regulation in the cases in which it has been exerted and of which we have given examples, upon the ground of special privilege conferred by the public on those affected, can not be supported. The underlying principle is that business of certain kinds holds such a peculiar relation to the public interest that there is superinduced upon it the right of public regulation. (German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S., 411).

"The extraordinary circumstances of war may bring particular business and enterprises clearly into the category of those which are affected with a public interest and which demand immediate and thoroughgoing public regulation. The production and distribution of foodstuffs, articles of prime necessity, those which have direct relation to military efficiency, those which are absolutely required for the support of the people during the stress of conflict, are plainly of this sort. Reasonable regulations to safeguard the resources upon which we depend for military success must be regarded as being within the powers confided to Congress to enable it to prosecute a successful war. In the words of the Supreme Court:

"It is well settled that the Constitution is not self-destructive. In other words, that the power which it confers on the one hand it does not immediately take away on the other. (Billings v. United States, 232 U. S., 282.)

"This was said in relation to the taxing powers. Having been granted in express terms, the court held it had not been taken away by the due process clause of the fifth amendment. As the Supreme Court put it in another case:

"The Constitution does not conflict with itself by conferring upon the one hand a taxing power and taking the same power away on the other by the limitations of the due process clause. (240 U. S., 24.)

"Similarly, it may be said that the power has been expressly given to Congress to prosecute war and to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying that power into execution. That power explicitly conferred and absolutely essential to the safety of the Nation is not destroyed or impaired by any later provision of the Constitution or by any one of the amendments. These may all be construed so as to avoid making the Constitution self-destructive, so as to preserve the rights of the citizen from unwarrantable attack, while assuring beyond all hazard the common defense and the perpetuity of our liberties. These rest upon the preservation of the Nation."

MESSAGE OF MAJ. GEN. LEONARD WOOD.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a message from Gen. Wood to the officers and graduates at the Plattsburg camp at the graduation exercises of the first class this year.

Gen. Wood was more largely instrumental than any other man in the organization and the idea of this camp, and what he says in this message is of such a strong and patriotic character that I think it ought to be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE FATHER OF PLATTSBURG GREETES ITS GRADUATES.

Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, commanding the Southeastern Department, to-day sent the following message to the commanding officer of each of the Plattsburg training camps in his department:

"Please express to the young gentlemen completing this course my sincere appreciation of the good work they have done and my best wishes for their future success, and say to them for me that their real work now commences in training men for the present great war. They must always remember that while discipline must be strict and the performance of duty rigidly insisted upon, all this can be accomplished without destroying the self-respect of the soldier, and that the performance of official duty should always be marked by self-control and courtesy. Nothing is gained and much is lost if these are not always maintained. The self-respect of the soldier is vital to his success. Destroy this and you have a man with a poor spirit, and consequently a poor soldier and an army which will never go through to the end. The most cordial and friendly relations between officers and men can exist without any loss of official status or control on the part of the officer.

"In developing the armies of the Republic this must always be borne in mind. They must strive to build up that feeling of confidence and interdependence between officers and men which must be present if the Army is to have the real spirit which will carry it on to victory and final success, and they should always remember that their conduct, appearance, and performance of duty is noted by every man in their command, and as they perform their duty and conduct themselves in the affairs of life so will those under them in the great majority of cases shape their conduct. If they want the highest degree of efficiency, they must themselves be in the highest degree efficient. They must place upon every man who comes under their command the impress of duty and loyalty.

"LEONARD WOOD."

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Husting	Martin	Simmons
Brady	James	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Brandee	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smoot
Culberson	Kellogg	Page	Sterling
Curtis	Kenyon	Pittman	Stone
Dillingham	King	Polindexter	Swanson
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Thompson
France	Knox	Robinson	Trammell
Gerry	La Follette	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Gore	Lodge	Shafroth	Watson
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Sherman	Williams
Hollis	McNary	Shields

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS]. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the Senator proceeds I should like to ask unanimous consent to authorize the clerks to correct section numbers and figures in totals affected by amendments to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KNOX. What is the request?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the clerks be authorized to correct section numbers where they are changed from one section to another and figures in totals where affected by amendments to the bill.

Mr. KNOX. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the pending question before the Senate is the motion to strike out the tax of 2 cents per pound imposed upon coffee. The amendment is found on page 85 of the original bill, the first item under section 900, Title IX. The House imposed an increase in duty of 10 per cent upon all present duties imposed upon goods imported into this country, as well as a 10 per cent increase upon all goods imported now coming free into this country. Under that imposition of an increase of 10 per cent it was estimated that a revenue of $206,000,000 would be raised.

Your committee decided that an imposition of a flat 10 per cent rate upon dutiable articles as well as free was unscientific; that it would work a hardship in many, many cases; that it would upset business in the country that had been established in using articles that had entered into the country free for the last hundred years; and therefore the committee decided to strike out that part of the House text and substitute for it Title IX, "War excise tax on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar."

There was some complaint about consumption taxes being imposed. The House provision imposed 10 per cent duty on everything that was consumed by the American people. Your committee decided that in order to raise $87,000,000 they would impose a small consumption tax, or excise tax, upon four articles only—coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar.

Under the Senate committee provision there would be raised from tea $5,000,000, from coffee twenty-odd million dollars, from cocoa $7,000,000—in passing I desire to say the amount will be less than that amount on cocoa on account of the amendment which was agreed to by the Senate on Saturday, offered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]—and on sugar $54,000,000, making in round numbers some $87,000,000.

The coffee consumed in the United States for the year 1916 amounted to 1,203,840,591 pounds. The average price of coffee in the United States in 1916 was 9.6 cents per pound.

There has been an objection to the imposition of 2 cents per pound upon coffee, and it has been argued that if this 2 cents a pound is imposed upon coffee Brazil, now very friendly to the United States, would take exceptions to such a tax and it would no doubt interfere with that friendship. I can not believe that any such argument as that is going to have any effect whatever upon the Senate. The same could be said of every article imported into the United States from all neutral or friendly countries, for we are imposing duties upon them.

In this connection I wish to call attention to what did occur after Congress decided to repeal the duty of 3 cents a pound upon coffee. Coffee was put upon the free list by the repeal of 3 cents a pound duty, and immediately Brazil imposed a 3 cents per pound export duty upon coffee, and instead of the 3 cents a pound going into the Treasury of the United States Brazil collected the 3 cents a pound on all her exportations of coffee to the United States.

I admit, Mr. President, that if we put a half a cent a pound excise duty upon sugar the consumer will have to pay the one-half a cent a pound extra. The price of sugar has already been fixed at what it shall be sold for in the United States the coming year—74 cents per pound at New York.

Mr. President, the average price of sugar in the United States in 1916 was 6.86 cents per pound; and when we take into consideration the fact that the price paid for sugar beets in this country will be at least 60 to 70 per cent higher than it was during that year, and when we take into consideration the fact that the price of sugar if it were left alone and took its chances in the world's market would be at least a cent and a half a pound more than the price fixed by the food commission, it seems to me that the imposition of half a cent a pound upon it in order to pay the expenses of the war is not going to be objected to upon the part of the people. Further, when you take into consideration that 35 per cent of all the sugar is used in the manufacturing of candies, and certainly candies are not a necessity but a luxury, and that the price at which candy is sold to-day is far in excess of all the increased cost that has been made upon the sugar or the ingredients of candy as compared with the price in 1914, I believe that this excise tax of half a cent a pound upon sugar should be imposed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator ought to mention the fact that the price which is fixed for the ensuing year has been fixed in anticipation of a tax of one-half cent a pound being levied as fixed in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I know in the discussion between the sugar producers and the commission it was considered at that time.

I am not like the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. He says that sugar is singled out and sugar is a product of his State, and opposes the tax on that ground. Mr. President, I care not where the imposition of a tax falls if it is a just tax and if the industry can stand the tax and if in doing so it will not interfere with the productivity of the line of industry in the United States. If it were not war times, and if the expenses of our Government were not so heavy as they are I, too, would oppose the imposition of an excise tax upon sugar. But every other civilized country imposes an excise tax upon sugar or heavy duties. Every other civilized country has long learned that sugar is an article on which Government taxes can be collected with less cost and in an easier way than almost any other product of the country.

What are the duties on these four articles imposed in foreign countries, together with the excise tax imposed on account of the war? Let us compare them. We have been of late regaled time and time again upon the wisdom of England in imposing heavy taxes on war profits, and England has been pointed to as an example for the Government of the United States to follow. What duties and excise taxes are being imposed on these articles by England and France? England imposes a duty of 2.8 cents per pound on sugar, and on refined sugar she imposes 3.1 cents per pound. In addition to that, she imposes an excise duty of 2½ cents per pound, while the United States is imposing a cent, in round numbers, duty upon sugar and half-a-cent excise tax—a cent-and-a-half total tax as against 5.5 cents in England.

England imposes a duty of 9.4 cents per pound on coffee, while we are imposing an excise duty of 2 cents per pound on coffee. England imposes a duty of 24 cents per pound on tea, while we are imposing a duty of 5 cents on tea. England imposes a duty of 2 cents per pound on glucose, while we are proposing to impose a duty of a quarter of a cent a pound on glucose. England imposes a 3-cent excise duty, over and above the 9.4 cents on coffee, on coffee substitutes, making the duty on coffee substitutes 12.4 cents per pound, while we are proposing to impose a tax of 2 cents a pound. England imposes a duty of $13.12 per pound and $13.12 per pound excise duty, making a tax of $26.24 on saccharine, and our total tax on saccharine is $3.15 per pound; in other words, $2.50 under this bill and 65 cents per pound under the tariff act.

England imposes a duty on cocoa of 13.8 cents per pound, while we are imposing under this bill a duty of 3 cents a pound.

Mr. President, I might take the time of the Senate in presenting the rates of taxes on these items in Germany, in France, and in other countries of the world, but there is no particular necessity for my doing so. Our excise taxes imposed under this title will hardly be felt in any home in all the country. So far as coffee is concerned, the average price of coffee for 1916 was 9.6 cents a pound. I do not believe that there are three articles in commerce to-day on which the profits are so large as they are upon coffee, tea, and glass and crockery ware. Go into almost any city of the United States and you will find some of the best business corners of the city occupied by stores which are generally known as tea company stores. They carry tea, coffee, glass and crockery ware, as well as sugar, and in many cases sell sugar at low cost as an advertisement. When you purchase tea, coffee, or glass and crockery ware you will find that the profits are enormous. If the profits were not enormous, such merchants could not pay the rent and the heavy expenses which are attached to such stores.

Mr. President, I believe that the retail price of coffee to-day is just as high as it can be in the United States without interfering with the consumption of coffee. The merchants keep that in mind, and I do not believe that the 2 cents a pound proposed to be imposed upon coffee is going to reach the consumer for these reasons.

So far as the tax on sugar is concerned, I know it will reach the consumer, as sugar is sold everywhere on so close a margin. If we put a one-eighth cent a pound tax on sugar it is paid by the consumer, but such will not be the case with a small tax on coffee, tea, and certain other articles of merchandise.

Take tea, Mr. President. The average price of tea in the United States for 1916 was 18.7 cents per pound. What is the consumer paying for it? The merchants are not content with a quarter of a cent or half a cent or 1 cent a pound profit; they are not content with a reasonable profit. Tea is sold to-day, Mr. President, at the highest price at which it is possible to sell it and not interfere materially with its consumption in the United States. So, Mr. President, your committee thought that of all the articles used by the people of the United States they could impose a tax, small as it is, upon these four articles, and that it would be so small the people of this country would hardly feel it.

I am asked by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to state what is the retail price generally of tea that costs 18.7 cents per pound wholesale, Mr. President, that is the average price; that price takes into consideration the higher-priced tea as well as the cheaper grades imported into this country. Take tea costing 11 cents per pound to the importer in 1916, and I do not believe there is a pound of it sold in the United States for less than 25 cents a pound. You can take a 20-cent per pound tea, paid by the importer, and it generally sells for 50 to 60 cents a pound. Such undue profits I think unjustifiable. If we impose a tax of 5 cents a pound, to be paid by the importer, I do not believe that it can all be passed on to the consumer unless they interfere with the consumption of the article in the United States; and the jobber, wholesaler, and retailer, with the profits that they are making, are never going to do it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. As a general rule I have a great deal of confidence in the figures given by the Senator from Utah, but I must say to him that I disagree with him in the statement he has just made. I had an opportunity during my life to be engaged in the mercantile business for at least 30 years. Of course I have conducted business only on a small scale, but I want to say to the Senator from Utah that he will find that there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of pounds of tea imported into this country for which the wholesaler pays as much as 38 and 40 cents a pound. He will also find that there is very little tea bought by the retail merchants of this country as low as 11 cents a pound.

I will further say to the Senator that during the 30 years I was engaged in business never have I been offered tea at as low a price as 11 cents a pound. I think it is only due to the retail trade—I hold no brief for the retail trade, and I have not been in the business for years and years—to say that it is hardly fair to blame the high price of tea on the retailers and to claim that they are making these enormous profits. I will say to the Senator that I know they are not making any such profits as the Senator would lead the Senate to believe they are.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota was in the business a little longer than I was, but I have sold tea and coffee; I have also sold crockery ware and sugar; and I have sold goods generally in the store for many, many years. I know the profits generally made on the different classes of merchandise. I will say to the Senator that the average price of tea in this country was 18.7 cents per pound for the year 1916. The 11 cents per pound for tea was paid by the importer, not by the retailer.

Take the very statement which the Senator has made, that there are hundreds of thousands of pounds of tea which come into this country that is sold to the wholesaler at 28 and 30 cents a pound—

Mr. GRONNA. At 38 and 40 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. It is sold to the wholesaler, the Senator says, at 38 and 40 cents a pound. Well, then, if that is the case—and I do not doubt it, and I have not said it was not—that would show the price of the lower grades of teas to be much less than 18 cents. So the very statement that the Senator from North Dakota makes demonstrates beyond a question of doubt that there are teas that came into this country in the year 1916 and many of them which sell for as low a price as 11 or 12 cents a pound.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Utah another question?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just wait until I have finished answering the question that he has already asked I will then again yield.

Mr. President, I am speaking of the importer; I do not know what the Senator paid for his tea; I am speaking of the cost of tea when it enters this country and the profits upon it from the time it enters until the consumer gets it. I do not know whether the Senator bought his tea from the importer or not; he may have bought it from a wholesale house and the wholesale house may have bought it from an importer or jobber; I do not know how many profits there might have been added to it by the time the Senator bought it; but I do know that there are teas that are selling in this country for as high as 75 cents and a dollar a pound, some of them as high as $2 a pound, and all of these grades of tea are taken into consideration when the Government of the United States reports that in 1916 the average price of teas imported into this country was 18.7 cents per pound.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to ask the Senator upon what he bases his figures—whether upon the actual cost, plus freight added laid down at New York or at the port of entry?

Mr. SMOOT. The price at the port of entry. I will say to the Senator that there were 109,865,935 pounds of tea imported into this country for the year 1916, and the price of that tea was $20,599,857, making on an average, Mr. President, 18.7 cents per pound. At the same time the average consumption of tea in the United States was 1.7 pounds per capita.

I know—and I was in the merchandise business—that a large profit is made upon tea and a large profit is made upon coffee, and that is understood by merchants generally. I do not want to lay the blame of high prices at the door of anybody unless the blame should be laid there. I have just as much interest in the retailers of this country as I have in the wholesalers, and I might say a great deal more than I have in the importers. When the tariff question was under consideration, it was demonstrated beyond a question of doubt that the profits upon glassware from the manufacturer to the consumer ran as high as 400 per cent. Mr. President, it was demonstrated that a 10 by 12 pane of window glass that sold in this city at 15 cents retail was delivered in New York, with the duty added, at 3½ cents per pound. I am not going into a discussion as to how these profits were distributed, but those facts were demonstrated beyond a question of doubt.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator that glassware is sold at a very high price by retail hardware dealers.

Mr. SMOOT. By general merchants as well.

Mr. GRONNA. Tea is being sold by grocers and other retailers. Will the Senator give the percentage of such merchants who are successful in this country? The Senator, of course, is familiar with the figures. Now, if it is a fact that the retailer is making such an enormous profit, will the Senator kindly state the number of grocers or the number of merchants who fail and the percentage who are successful and do not fail during their business careers?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say as to the grocers; I can say, of course, as to general business; but that does not demonstrate at all that the profits being made on certain lines of articles in the United States are not excessive.

Mr. GRONNA. But if the dealers make such a tremendous profit, it seems to me they ought to be successful.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he knows of very many tea and coffee houses failing? I will ask him if in his own city they are not found, and do they not occupy some of the best stores in his city, and do they not confine their activities generally to tea, coffee, sugar, glass, and crockery ware?

Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator has asked me the question, I will answer him. I will say to him that I could name in the city of Chicago, in St. Paul, and in many other western cities hundreds of men handling tea and coffee who have failed in business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I speak from the experience that I have had in business. I know that there is undue profit made upon the articles named, and I do not believe that the tax proposed to be imposed is going to have a material effect upon the retail price to the consumer.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator any information relative to the tax on freight from English provinces coming to this country? I will say to the Senator from Utah that I am informed that tea coming from the British East Indies is increased in price to the extent of at least 20 cents a pound as the result of the additional freight taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that would be a freight charge of $400 a ton.

Mr. CALDER. It is very large, but I thought that the Senator might have some information in regard to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the information at hand to give the Senator; but it is understood, of course, that the ocean freight rates have increased in some cases 500 per cent, and, I presume, in some cases a thousand per cent; but it can not possibly be that $400 a ton freight is being paid on tea.

Mr. CALDER. I am referring to the tax levied by Great Britain on tea coming from her provinces in India to this country.

Mr. SMOOT. The tea tax of England now is 24 cents, the same as it was before the war. It can not be a question of a tax imposed upon tea. When it comes to this country of course it comes direct from Japan or direct from China or from wherever the English ship it. I admit that what the Senator says is true so far as the control of the tea market, or the great bulk of it, is concerned.

Mr. CALDER. But I am referring to a freight tax levied by Great Britain on teas coming from India. Teas coming from India to-day are much higher priced, I am informed, than teas from any other part of the world.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say as to that; but I am giving the latest figures furnished by the Treasury Department.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I hardly think there can be a freight tax imposed; if there is any tax at all, it must be an export tax, and I have heard of no such tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to suggest, in view of the difference of construction or conclusion that is arrived at between himself and my colleague from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], that it makes very little difference whether the retailer makes big profits, or whether, taking his business as a whole, he goes into bankruptcy; the truth still remains that tea, the average of which is imported at 18 cents a pound, sells for 40 cents a pound and over, and if the business can absorb 100 per cent it might easily absorb the half-cent tax without any injury to the consuming public.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I said, the pending question has reference only to coffee and coffee substitutes. I take it for granted, of course, that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] will follow up this amendment with other amendments striking out the excise taxes upon tea and upon cocoa and upon sugar. I judge that from what the Senator said on Saturday.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to consume any more of the time of the Senate now upon this question, but what I have said in relation to tea and coffee well applies also to cocoa.

I recognize the fact, Mr. President, that there is a disposition in the Senate not to impose a tax of any kind that will fall directly upon the voter. If the arguments that have been made here are correct the consumer ultimately will have to pay all of the taxes imposed under this bill. I hope that consumption taxes will not have to be greatly extended; but if they are to be extended, or if they are to be begun, I know of no four articles on which $87,000,000 could be raised with so little burden upon the individual consumer of the United States as the four that your committee has selected.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will support the committee and retain in the bill these four items under Title IX.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I had not intended to take any of the time of the Senate to discuss this bill, but in view of the surpassing importance of the measure to the life of the Nation and to all of the industries of the country I have concluded to state the reasons which impel me to vote for certain provisions of the bill and which will be controlling in the ultimate disposition thereof.

I can not say that the bill as a whole is as I would have drawn it myself. I do not suppose there is any Senator but who believes that in certain respects he could improve it. Among 96 Senators, coming from all over this country, where different conditions of industry exist, it is, of course, a necessary result that there should be great diversity of opinion as to the subjects of taxation and the amount thereof.

But this bill should be considered in a broad, liberal way, having in view the necessities of the Nation in its hour of greatest trial, having in view the industries of the country, and having first in view the necessities of the Army and the Navy and the young men who are going abroad to fight our battles.

I do not pretend—no one would claim—that the sacrifices which are to be made by the business interests of this country are at all commensurate with the splendid sacrifice or the honor of the service of the young men who are dedicating their lives that this Nation may exist as a great, free democracy; and when we talk of conscripting wealth, no one would object to raising by taxation all the money that may be necessary, or that the officials in the Government believe reasonably to be necessary, to carry on this war effectively. The taxes, of course, should be based upon wealth, principally upon excess profits, incomes, inheritances, and luxuries; and I am in favor of taxing those sources of revenue to any limit which may be necessary to carry on this war effectively and to bring peace at the earliest moment to a distracted world.

There are many reasons why these sources of taxation should be first taken. The great mass of the people, the productive energy of labor, should be left in its strongest position. They can not afford to bear the burden; and taxation should be placed where it encourages the individual enterprise, energy, and productivity of the great mass of the people.

Mr. President, of course these are self-evident statements. The question is, first, What percentage of the revenue necessary to carry on the war and pay the expenses of government should be obtained from taxation, and what percentage should be obtained from the sale of bonds? Upon this question there is, there always has been, and there always will be great divergence of opinion.

Some political economists whose ability I do not question in the least will demonstrate to you, or think they can demonstrate to you, that the entire cost of the war should be borne by current taxation. Political economists of equal ability think they can demonstrate to you that free trade is the only true economic principle; and yet there is not a country in the world except Great Britain which has followed that principle, and Great Britain is bound to abandon it. I might say also that with this question of the percentage that should be paid by current taxation statesmen have been struggling for centuries, and they have come to the conclusion, as the acts of these statesmen show, that a reasonable percentage should be paid by current taxation and a reasonable percentage by bond issues.

I am aware of the fact that war industries and the issue of bonds tend greatly to inflation unless there is a corresponding amount of taxation, and of course inflation increases the burdens of war and will bear heavily not only upon this generation but upon future generations. But it has been found impossible in these great conflicts of the last 100 or 150 years for governments to bear all of the expenses by current taxation, and the issue of bonds to some extent has been found necessary.

In the old times, when war was carried on principally in conflicts between man and man and the machinery of war was simple, war finance was not as important as it is to-day; but in modern times, with the inventive genius of man, with all the great expense of war machinery, navies, artillery, aeroplanes, and submarines, with our complex industrial system; the finances of war are very important; and for more than 100 years no great war has been carried on and financed entirely by current taxation.

It is true that Napoleon carried on the great Napoleonic wars and created a financial system for France unequalled in the annals of finance of the world, and left France without a bonded debt created by him; but he levied tribute upon the nations overrun by his mighty armies, and even at that time the expenses of war were almost nothing in comparison with those of to-day. Why, if I recollect correctly what I have read, the entire cost of the French Government in the year 1800 was only 500,000,000 francs. It would not carry on the war going on to-day for 24 hours.

Now, the question arises, what proportion of the expenses of this war and the expenses of the current government should be paid by taxation, and what proportion by bonds? I have listened with great interest to debate pro and con upon this question and the conclusion of the committee. It appears from the statistics presented that we are raising during the current year a greater percentage of the expense of the war and the expense of the Government, compared with bond issues, than any of the belligerent nations of Europe; our percentage being about 36, it is estimated, while Great Britain's is about 26, France's 14, and Canada's 8.

I do not think this is conclusive at all. It might be that with the resources of this wonderful country we might lay a greater burden of taxation even than this. It might be that we might pay 50, 60, or 75 per cent of the expenses of the first year of the war out of taxation and do no injury to business. But we are levying taxes for 1917. Congress will meet again in December. I am willing to go to the extent that I believe we can absolutely safely levy taxes on business without crippling it, so that we may maintain the strength, the productivity, and the prosperity of this country to meet all the demands that may come to us if this war should last two or three years.

I do not say that by reason of any tenderness for capital or business, but merely as a reasonable precaution to raise only the amount of revenue that is necessary, and maintain the prosperity of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think it is a fair basis upon which to levy taxes in this country to institute a comparison between our country to-day and European nations? For instance, if the Senator will pardon me, we have had a number of years of peace. We have profited greatly by reason of the war in Europe. We will make during this year more than $9,000,000,000 of profits from corporations, to say nothing of the billions of dollars that will be made by private individuals. At least five or six billions of those profits are directly traceable to the war, what might be denominated war profits. It seems to me that to institute any comparison as a basis of taxation between this country and European nations, in view of their impoverished and well-nigh exhausted condition, would be fallacious. It seems to me that in establishing a taxing system for the present year we ought to take into account the fact that we have had abnormal profits, and that they are in a situation where they can be easily drafted or conscripted, to use the word so frequently employed in this debate, without injuring the business of the country at all. It seems to me that it is unfair to institute such a comparison and say that we ought to levy no greater per cent of taxation than European nations.

If the Senator will pardon me further, he will find that England, after three years of war, will collect this year, 1917, a little over $2,000,000,000 from excess profits or war profits and incomes, and will leave only about $700,000,000 to be collected from other sources. In other words, after three years of exhausting war, Great Britain collects approximately $3,000,000,000 in taxes for the year 1917.

Mr. KELLOGG. I agree with the Senator, but I do not think his comparison is at all conclusive. I think under the circumstances we should raise a greater percentage of the cost of the war for the first year than Great Britain, and we are going to do it.

The Senator is mistaken in one thing: Great Britain never was as prosperous within the memory of any man living as it has been since 1911 down to the present time.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KING. It is possibly a question, possibly a statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish the Senator would let me answer him, and then I will yield.

Mr. KING. All right.

Mr. KELLOGG. It has been shown that the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 were very prosperous years in Great Britain. On the contrary, they were not in this country. It is a fact that the industries of Great Britain to-day are more prosperous, owing undoubtedly to the production necessary to the war, than ever before. She is producing and exporting more goods than ever in the history of that country, and her foreign commerce, in spite of the war, has been growing rapidly within the last two years. She is sending millions of dollars' worth of those goods to this country and to all the world except to the belligerent nations opposed to her in the war.

Now, I do not claim that England's percentage of taxation is necessarily a guide by which we should levy taxes. I merely mentioned it in passing. It has come to be the judgment of all the great nations of the world that some of the expenses of the war must be paid by bond issue.

One question has arisen here, and that is the question whether we should levy taxes upon the people to pay for the bonds which we take from foreign countries. I can see no reason why we should levy current taxes to buy bonds of any of the allied nations. They could bring their bonds into our market and sell them. In fact, this is about the only market except their own in which they can sell bonds. But they would have to pay, as they have in the past, a very high rate of interest.

In order to aid them in financing the war we have said we will take our bonds and sell them to our people at a lower rate of interest and take your bonds in place of those. To my mind this transaction stands exactly the same as though those countries had sold their bonds or would sell their bonds in this market, except that by exchanging our bonds for British and French bonds we lessen the burdens of those countries; we strengthen their armies, we enable them to raise more money at home and unite with us in carrying on the war effectively. I do not see why we should levy current taxes to buy British bonds or French bonds, but we should permit the Treasury Department to issue the bonds in exchange for theirs, and as they pay the interest there is no burden upon the people of this country.

It is not true that those bonds are an expense to this country identically as so much taxes would be. Taxes are taken out and paid into the Treasury. A man who buys bonds, as it has been said upon this floor, can use those bonds as a basis of credit to carry on his business, and while the purchase of bonds may take a large amount of capital and may disturb temporarily the financial condition of the country, ultimately the taking of those bonds does not contract the credit of the country, because they are a basis of credit to carry on business.

Therefore I say that, excluding bonds issued for loans to our allies, we should raise a very large percentage of the money to carry on the war during the coming year by taxation and not by bond issue. On that question I assume the committee has had the advice and judgment of the Treasury Department. The committee has certainly given very careful consideration to the subject, and I am prepared to believe that their conclusions, at least for the present, are correct. I would be willing to go further and raise a larger sum by taxation.

The next question which confronts us is how much do we need to raise. Of course, I can not add anything to the discussion of this question. The estimates of the Treasury Department are before the Senate. I have, however, given some consideration to it and compared our expenditures for the first year of war with those of other countries. I send to the desk and ask to have incorporated in my remarks a table which has been published, and I have no doubt all Senators have seen it, showing the expenditures of all the belligerent nations for the expenses of the war during the first three years.

The table referred to is as follows:

Following tabulation sets forth aggregate cost of the war to August 1 for the leading nations of the two groups of powers, daily current rates of expenditures, and the grand total of cost to all the nations engaged, less advances made by various powers to their allies and dominions:

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall not stop to comment upon this at length, but in passing would remark that it appears that Great Britain has expended, in round numbers, $26,000,000,000 in three years, of which I believe about $5,000,000,000 have been loaned to her allies, leaving $21,000,000,000 as the cost of the war and the maintenance of the Government of Great Britain for the period of three years, or $7,000,000,000 per annum.

Of course it is said that we must loan more money the first year than Great Britain has loaned to her allies during the entire war. If this is necessary or advisable to win the war, I hope that it will be done, and if it is necessary to raise a part of it by taxation rather than by bond sale, I hope that will be done. We are not going to advance it all, however, within the next three months, and we shall know as time goes on, when Congress meets again, how much it will be necessary to advance. I understand a bond bill is now before Congress which provides for an issue of bonds to meet this exigency.

But in passing let me say again that by the estimate it is fair to say that Great Britain's expense during the last year of the war has been about $11,000,000,000, although the average for the three years is $7,000,000,000. It is said that we will expend, and I am not prepared to dispute it, the first year of the war substantially as much as Great Britain has expended during the last year of the war. I believe Secretary McAdoo's total estimate for the fiscal year 1918 is $11,782,371,000. Deducting from this the ordinary revenue for Government expenditures, it would leave $10,448,871,000, or substantially the amount which Great Britain has expended during the last year of the war.

Now, let us stop and think about that. I say this may be necessary, although I have great doubt whether this country will be enabled to spend, using reasonable economy, any such a sum of money during the first year. In the three years which Great Britain has carried on this war she has maintained an enormous navy, far beyond anything contemplated in this country. She has had to raise an army, because when the war broke out she had barely 250,000 men in England, and she has had to build munitions factories and other factories necessary to carry on the war. She has raised an army of 6,000,000 men. She has built her great munitions factories and cantonments for the training of that army, and she has waged war upon a foreign soil—in France, at the Dardanelles, and in the East. She has paid enormous prices for transportation as well as large prices for the munitions and other materials in this and other foreign countries; but with 6,000,000 men in the field and all the armament for that magnificent army, she carried on the war last year at a cost of $11,000,000,000. But assuming that it will be necessary, assuming that we spend $11,000,000,000 during the next year, we are proposing to raise of that sum about 36 per cent by taxation, and, if it is found necessary, when Congress meets in December we may increase that amount.

As I said before, the first and controlling question is, How can we best lend strength to the armies of the Nation? How can we best sustain the splendid young men who are going to fight our battles on a foreign soil? If we can do it best by raising more money, by increasing the tax levy, it should be done. If we can do it best by this tax bill, by maintaining, as far as possible, the industrial energy and productiveness of the country, I am in favor of doing that. No consideration or tenderness for capital should, nor do I believe does, have the slightest effect on any Senator in this Chamber. He is considering what to-day is necessary to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

I should like to say a few words upon the question of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator should not consider the amount raised in this bill as the total war tax levied. The bill provides for two billion and a half, but the Senator will recall that heretofore we have passed what we called a war-revenue bill. That raises something around $500,000,000, which, of course, would be added to this and would make the entire war levy about $3,000,000,000 for this year, and another billion for ordinary expenses would make the total levy for this year, in round numbers, about $4,000,000,000.

Again, I wish to say to the Senator, as suggestions are made as to the amount of profits made by corporations, it has been spoken of as eight or nine billion dollars as estimated for this year. That is an estimate, of course. It may be a correct estimate; probably it is; but in 1914, which was not a very good year, at just the beginning of the war and before corporations or individuals began to make large war profits, the net incomes of corporations was something around four and a half billion dollars. So it would be a mistake to suppose that the corporations are making eight or nine billion dollars more now than they were making in peace times. If the estimates for this year are correct, they are making something around $4,000,000,000 more.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. I have not gone into the details. I have, of course, taken into consideration the previous tax bill in addressing my remarks to that subject.

Now, what is this so-called war-profits tax? It has been assumed in the debate by some Senators that it was the profits certain large corporations had made out of the war. As a matter of fact the original amendment reported to the Senate committee did contemplate taxing the difference between the prewar profits and the profits of 1917, but we must not forget that that plan has been entirely changed, for reasons which I will mention later, and that the plan now adopted is to levy a tax on all individuals, partnerships, and corporations engaged in business in this country, from the farmer to the biggest manufacturer, on all profits in 1917 in excess of the prewar profits, with a minimum of 6 per cent and a maximum of 10 per cent. If we were discussing merely how much taxes we should levy upon big corporations that had made profits out of the war that would be one proposition; but we are now discussing the proposition of taxing all normal and other increases of business over 1911, 1912, and 1913.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that all over this country are thousands of individuals, small partnerships and corporations, where the earnings bear no relation to the amount of capital, but where the earnings are made by reason of the energy and enterprise of the individual, the partnership, or the corporation officers and stockholders of small corporations. You will find in your own towns all over the country a great many partnerships, with 5, 6, 8, or 10 partners, whose enterprise, energy, and ability, rather than whose capital, have made the profits for the concern, and that 10 per cent on capital is not a large income—it is small, and is in many cases what you might call subnormal.

I am not willing, unless it is necessary or I can believe it is reasonably necessary, in this war to lay an undue burden upon the individual enterprise and ability of these small concerns all over the country. The industries of this country are not measured by the great corporations; the great industries are scattered through all the villages and hamlets of this land.

In nearly every town in the United States will be found some little manufacturing industry furnishing employment to the people and a market for agricultural products. Together, these industries make the very foundation of the prosperity of this Nation and are the hope of its future industrial greatness. While large corporations are necessary in the aggregate they are but small compared to the numberless industries in every hamlet of the land. You are proposing to tax them the same on their excess profits as the big corporations, which are usually capitalized for the amount of the money invested. In justification of the amendment by the committee it must be said that if we should take the prewar profits as a basis without any limitation and only tax war profits, a large number of the big corporations earning great revenue before the war would escape taxation altogether. Many such corporations have been named on this floor: The Ford and other automobile concerns, the Standard Oil Co., the American Tobacco Co., and so forth; for that reason it seems inadvisable to permit these large concerns to deduct their entire prewar profits from 1917 earnings before there should be a tax imposed.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. PAGE. I am very much interested in what the Senator from Minnesota is saying in regard to the small partnerships and the individual merchants and manufacturers who have made their war profits very largely because the goods in stock have appreciated in value from January to January of the war years to such an extent that they have made seemingly a very large profit; but when the end of the war comes those goods will go down, perhaps even faster than they have gone up, and perhaps even to a larger extent. If we should take a large part of the profits which accrue by virtue of the simple rise in prices, how are we to treat the merchant fairly when at the end of the war he loses perhaps half of all that he has made during the war?

Mr. KELLOGG. There is much reason in what the Senator from Vermont says. That is one of the risks of business. There is no question, however, that we are not only taxing the so-called war profits, but we are taxing the normal increase of the business of this country from a subnormal basis in 1911, 1912, and 1913 to a prosperous basis in 1917, whether that prosperity was due to war or whether it was due to the energy and enterprise of the partners and the normal increase of business in the country. So, I say, it is perfectly evident that making a minimum of 6 per cent and a maximum of 10 per cent will increase the revenue not alone from some big corporations but from a vast number of small corporations and partnerships, because the addition of that minimum and maximum will add over $500,000,000 to this tax bill.

I believe no one is going to complain of heavy taxation on the earnings of large corporations, which have been manufacturing war material and sending it to European countries at enormous prices. If we could raise sufficient revenue by imposing all the taxes on these concerns, I believe every one would be willing to do it.

Of course, there is no reason why the people of this country should not charge reasonable prices and make fair profits. England has insisted on making profits out of material which she is furnishing the allied nations. In all the wars in which we have engaged, Great Britain, France, Germany, and other countries have permitted their manufacturers and producers to make all the profits they could out of us, but now that we are engaged in the war and our energies and resources are to be added to the energies and resources of European countries, we should not be justified in permitting these manufacturers to make exorbitant profits out of war, and I hope and believe they are not going to be permitted to do so.

About the income tax, I shall only say a word. I believe we shall raise by the income tax about $1,200,000,000; and the rates in connection with the income law of 1916, including the 4 per cent normal tax, extend from 5 per cent to about 67 per cent. I have made a calculation of these rates, and I ask that it be included in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

State and municipal taxes in addition to above.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, we must not forget that many of the men who will pay income taxes will also pay very large excess-profits taxes. That was illustrated by the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] when he stated an illustrative case.

Take a partnership where the capital is small, where the partners devote their time to the business; much of their capital is borrowed upon the individual credit of the partners rather than upon permanently invested capital in the business. You will first deduct from that partnership a very large excess-profits tax over their profits in 1911, 1912, and 1913, controlled by the minimum and maximum per cent. All of the balance of the earnings of that partnership, whether divided or not, and whether it is necessary to remain in the business as capital to meet the needs of the expansion of the business, is taxed under the income-tax law.

And here permit me to say I believe the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota ought to be adopted. It will permit partnerships to deduct from their surplus a reasonable amount to be used as capital, subject, of course, to the excess-profits tax. The amendment of the committee provides for levying a 10 per cent tax on the undistributed corporate surplus not invested or employed in the business or retained in the business for its reasonable requirements. This, in effect, permits corporations to retain a reasonable sum as surplus to be employed in this business, without distributing it to its stockholders and making it subject to the income tax. This surplus income, of course, will be subject to the 6 per cent corporation tax and to the excess-profits tax. Why should we not likewise permit partnerships to hold a reasonable amount of their surplus in the business subject to the excess-profits tax but not subject to the income tax imposed upon the partners? Under the committee's amendment all sums held by the partnership, whether distributed or not, are subject to the income tax. Comparing the income tax imposed upon individuals by this bill with the income tax of the principal belligerent nations, it will be found that ours far exceeds most, if not all, of theirs. And in considering the amount of the income and excess-profits tax we must bear in mind one other fact which differentiates this country from most foreign countries. In addition to the taxes levied by the Federal Government, we have large local taxation—the State and municipal taxes throughout the country must be added to the Federal taxes in order to make any fair comparison. So when you take all the taxes levied in this country, I believe it will be found that we are imposing a burden as great, if not greater, than the principal nations of Europe engaged in the war.

But, as I have already stated, I am willing to go further whenever it can be shown that it is necessary to lend strength to our cause.

There is one other amendment pending before the Senate concerning which I desire to say a few words, and that is the amendment proposing an inheritance tax. I am not prepared to indorse all of the percentages in the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], but I am prepared to advocate an inheritance tax. I believe it to be the most just and the easiest of collection of all taxes, and I believe it will burden the people less than any other tax which we can impose.

The principal argument which has been made against the imposition of an inheritance tax by the Federal Government is that it will interfere with the taxation of the States and frequently result in double taxation. That, of course, should be avoided; but all of the great taxes we are levying may, and some of them certainly will, result in double taxation, for some of the States have income taxes; most of the States, of course, have inheritance and direct taxes, and some of them have excise taxes. That argument, however, is met by the provision in the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma which allows a deduction of all taxes levied on inheritances by the States. Now, there are some States that impose no inheritance tax.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I am interested in what the Senator is saying with regard to the inheritance tax; but of the total number of 48 States there are comparatively few that do not have an inheritance tax. I have just looked up the matter, and I find in the World Almanac for 1917 a list of the States given, and there are just five States in the Union that do not impose an inheritance tax. Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, New Mexico, and South Carolina are the five States not making provision for the collection of inheritance taxes.

I should like further to suggest to the Senator the question as to how much would be left to the Federal Government, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, if the States are to have credit for the inheritance taxes which they impose. It occurred to me that if in the collection of the national inheritance tax the several States are to be credited by the Federal Government with the inheritance taxes imposed by them, the rates of which are as high or higher than provided in the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, there would be comparatively little left for the Federal Government under the amendment proposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, will he permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator considered that if the Government levies too large a tax of this character it will seriously impair the revenues of the States? The larger States, among the number my own, the third largest in the Union, collect a considerable portion of their revenue from this source. I have not the exact figures before me, but Illinois, for instance, collects approximately a million and a half dollars every 12 months from an estate tax; so that it becomes quite an important source of revenue. In that State the rate of taxation for local and other purposes outside of the governmental exactions is very high, the rate in my home city of Springfield being nearly $8 on every $100 of assessed valuation; so that many of our school districts and local taxing areas are impaired in their revenue; they have reached the constitutional limit, and no increase of revenue on the assessed value of the property is possible. We, therefore, are compelled to turn to some of these indirect sources, such as inheritance taxes, which, as I have said, in recent years have become very large sources of revenue, thereby raising the amount of revenue that is distributed to the various taxing bodies which are now showing a deficiency of revenue. That problem has concerned many of the State authorities, as I know it has concerned many Senators, namely, the serious impairment of our sources of revenue if a much greater tax should be levied by the Government.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is true that there are only five or six States that do not levy inheritance taxes, but in many of the States the inheritance tax is very low, the maximum being 5 per cent in some States. I have not examined them all, but I was looking over a number of them this morning.

I would not by a Federal inheritance tax impair the revenue of the States. I do believe that a reasonable and wise Federal inheritance tax, largely increased on the large estates, would tend to equalize the taxes throughout the States and to bring up the taxes upon large estates to a higher level than to-day prevails.

I say that it is perfectly ridiculous for one to leave sixty or a hundred million dollars and only require the payment of an inheritance tax of 4 or 5 per cent upon it. The great fortunes of this country do not make the country great. I would not take away from any young man the hope of reaching the highest position in industry and accomplishing what many of the great business men of the country have accomplished; I would leave before him always that hope, that individual enterprise, which is the guiding star of our industrial life; but when men may pile up, as they have in a country with unbounded resources like ours, great fortunes and leave them to their children without taxation, I say it is wrong. Those fortunes are usually a curse to the children to whom they are left. I believe that a man should lay up a reasonable sum to take care of his family and shield them from the hardships of the world, but I do not believe that any system should exist that places an enormous burden of taxation upon the man who is struggling in the pursuit of industry and a small taxation upon the man who receives a great fortune by inheritance. I believe that if the committee would adopt a reasonable, progressive Federal inheritance tax, permitting the States to deduct the total amount of any inheritance tax which the States may from time to time adopt, it would tend to raise the level of taxation upon the great fortunes and tend to equalize the taxation on inheritances throughout the country.

There is great disparity between the systems of inheritance taxes in the various States to-day, and in many cases there is double taxation. A man living in New York, as I stated the other day, may have to pay an inheritance tax on all his personal property and pay another on some of that personal property situated in Wisconsin and Minnesota which has a local situs, because the courts have held that the stock of a Minnesota corporation is local in Minnesota, although the decedent lived in the State of New York.

I think that a reasonable inheritance tax would bear least as a burden upon the people of this country. It would tend to divide up the great fortunes instead of consolidating them. The right of inheritance is the creation of law. Many of the great fortunes of this country have been made by the natural growth of the country, and the increase of our resources by capitalizing the energy and labor of the people. A system of taxation which legitimately turns back to the people a proportion of this wealth is justified by the advanced opinion of all civilized nations. I have nothing to say against the enterprise which enables men honestly to amass reasonable fortunes, but I do not believe the law of inheritance should be left so that these great estates may practically escape taxation. I do not say that I would take all of any estate over and above any fixed amount. But I would have a progressive tax increased so that when you reach millions upon millions in some of these estates which are transmitted by the laws of inheritance or by bequest, a very large tax should be placed upon them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to inquire whether he is in favor of covering this proposition, so that if any of the States hereafter should enact an inheritance tax they would stand upon the same basis as States which already have such a law? In other words, take Florida, for instance. There is no inheritance law at all in that State. Does the Senator want to leave it open so that if Florida enacted a law of that sort, Florida would stand on the same footing under the law as the States which already have such a law?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator from Florida that that is exactly what I said. The Senator perhaps misunderstood me. I would allow, first, to be deducted from this tax any inheritance taxes from time to time imposed by the States. The manner of collecting this tax can be arranged by regulations of the Treasury Department, and it is easy of collection. All these estates must pass through the probate or surrogate courts of the various States wherein valuation is determined. When the State imposes its inheritance tax, the Federal Government gives the State the amount of the local tax, and, if there is any balance, takes it, and if a wise, progressive inheritance tax is adopted by Congress it will very greatly increase the rates of taxation upon the larger fortunes.

Mr. President, I believe that the money necessary to carry on this war should be raised by income taxes, excess-profits taxes, inheritance taxes, and taxes on beverages and the luxuries, rather than to place the burden upon the people generally. It should be a tax on business and wealth, which is able to bear it, rather than a tax upon the great toiling masses of the Nation.

I would rather see a high inheritance tax placed upon large fortunes, large excess profits and income taxes placed upon business and wealth, than see a burdensome tax imposed upon the necessities of life. In a general way, however, I approve the principal provisions of this bill. We must remember that it may be necessary in the near future to largely increase these taxes, and we should not hesitate to do so if thereby we are enabled to prosecute the war more vigorously and bring a lasting peace to this Nation and to the world.

What the Nation needs in this hour is the united support of all the people. No party differences do or should divide us in the face of the common enemy of all civilization. We should marshal the brains, inventive genius, labor, industry, and patriotism of the Nation for the prosecution of our part in this the world's greatest conflict. We should consider this revenue bill wisely and tolerantly, having in view the highest interest of the brave men who are giving the most to the Nation, and also the maintenance of industry, thrift, and enterprise, which must furnish the implements of battle for ourselves and our allies.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this is not the time to discuss the causes or to discuss the wisdom of this war. Questions of that character must be adjudicated at the bar of history. We are in the war now, and we must win the war. The only way out is straight ahead. Not only must we win, but, as I have often said in the past, we must make it a short war; make it a successful war. We can not afford to fail. To fail would be the supreme tragedy of all history. To fail would change, would mar the destiny of the human race. To fail would blot out of the future, both the star of hope and the bow of promise. Upon those points there can be no division of views. But the supreme problem which we are called upon now to consider and to solve is the best ways and means of financing this war to an early and to an acceptable peace.

From every point of view this war has no precedent in all the tides of time. There are, therefore, no beaten paths. There are no unerring guides. There are no fixed and established standards for our conduct. Questions of this character deserve the most serious discussion, deserve the most serious consideration.

This war is a serious strain upon all the resources of all the nations involved. It is an especial strain upon the financial resources of all the nations involved. The question of financing the war would be of vast importance if it were a brief war and if it were a war upon a limited scale and proportion. But, sir, when we take into account the unprecedented magnitude of this war and the unprecedented expenditures which it requires, the question is not merely important, it is one of supreme and uncompromising necessity.

I desire to illustrate the expenditures of this war. We have now been at war less than five months. We have not fired a single shot in battle; yet we have been called upon to provide some $18,000,000,000. No matter by what method this amount is to be raised, no matter as to the final payment or repayment in part by the allies, this amount is an immediate draft upon the financial resources of the people of the United States. Eighteen billion dollars is much more than all the gold upon the globe. It is five times as much as the total cost of the Civil War. It is four times as much as the total cost of all the wars in which the United States has been engaged. Eighteen billion dollars is much more than Russia has expended during the war. It is much more than France has expended during the war. It is more than Germany has expended during the war. It is more than half as much as Great Britain has expended during the war. Eighteen billion dollars is several times the aggregate annual earnings of all the wage earners in the United States. It means $900 for every family under the flag. Nine hundred dollars is nearly twice as much as the average annual earnings of the average wage earner in the United States during times of peace. Eighteen billion dollars is the beginning, not the end. Nothing need be added to this statement to demonstrate the stupendous importance of founding our financial system upon sound principles of public finance.

I know that public finance is looked upon as a science of mysteries. It undoubtedly has its complications; yet there are certain truths, there are certain principles underlying the science of public finance, which are self-evident. Four of those I shall state.

First. Taxes should be apportioned among the taxpayers in accordance with their ability to pay. I think that is self-evident.

Second. Income constitutes a better standard than capital for the measurement of ability to pay. That can not be challenged.

Third. Vexatious taxes, burdensome taxes, taxes which impose upon the taxpayer burdens out of proportion to the revenues received by the Government, ought not to be the first taxes imposed. They ought to be among the last; and the resources for less objectionable taxation ought to be practically exhausted before the more onerous taxes are resorted to.

Last. No system of public finance is sound which dries up the sources of future revenue. Any sound system must acknowledge the certainty of future demands and conserve the sources of future supplies.

I say these principles are self-evident; but these principles, Mr. President, relate to only one side of the science of public finance. They relate, excepting the last one, to taxation alone. Now, there are two methods by which the Government can raise the revenue to meet the expenditures and exactions of this war. Under the Constitution the Government has the power to tax and it has the power to borrow. All the money required must be raised by the exercise of one or the other of these powers.

The existence of these two powers gives rise to three theories, to three possible policies, of financing the war. The first is based exclusively upon the power of taxation—the policy of raising all the revenue required by taxation alone. This is known as the "pay-as-you-go" or "pay-as-you-enter" policy. It has the sanction of many high authorities. Whenever the necessities of the situation can be met in this way it is undoubtedly the wisest way. It minimizes the evils during the progress of the war and it minimizes the aftermath of industrial depression, shrinkage, and wreckage, which follow like ravens in the wake of war.

The second plan is based exclusively upon the use of public credit. This policy has few to recommend it. No warring nation to-day relies upon that system, excepting, I believe, Germany alone. I have seen the statement that Germany was issuing bonds to raise money to pay the interest on her bonded indebtedness. That is an essentially unsound system of financing a war. Possibly Germany was led to the adoption of such a plan by her previous success in exacting indemnities from her subjugated enemies.

The third plan is based upon a combination of the two powers—the power to tax and the power to borrow. Generally the warring nations have adopted this policy. The United States has already committed itself to this system. In all of our previous wars, excepting the Revolution, in which the Government did not have the power to tax, the United States has relied upon a composite system—the power to tax and the power to borrow.

But, Mr. President, this combination raises one important question, it raises one vital question, and that is this: What proportion of the revenues required should be raised by taxation and what proportion should be raised by the use of public credit?

Upon the answer to this question depends the soundness and success of the system. This is the issue joined between the majority and the minority reports coming out of the Finance Committee. The majority place a larger reliance upon credit and a less reliance upon taxation than do the minority. To reverse it, the minority place a larger reliance upon taxation and a less reliance upon bonds than do the majority. Possibly the Senate will not adopt the best system at this time, but before the war is concluded I believe the people will oblige us to adopt a sounder system.

The War of 1812 cost the Government some $70,000,000. Less than $7,000,000 of that amount was raised by taxation. The rest was raised by the issuance of bonds and Treasury notes. The inevitable evils of such a system followed—inflation, the decline of public credit, and a sequel of industrial and commercial depression after the war.

The Mexican War cost the United States about $63,000,000. Fourteen million dollars of that amount was raised by taxation, $49,000,000 by the issuance of bonds or the use of public credit. The war was a brief one. The expenditures were no great exaction upon the resources of the country. The evils of the system were not so manifest at that time, but as an evil precedent it had its sequel of disastrous consequences soon after, when the Civil War burst upon the country. Following the precedent established during the Mexican War, the Government began by relying chiefly upon public credit and only in a limited measure upon taxation. At the outbreak of the war, Secretary Chase recommended that sufficient taxes be imposed to raise revenue to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt, and that the military expenses be raised by resort to the public credit. The inevitable evils followed, the inflation of prices and a marked decline in the public securities in the public credit. About the middle of the war the Government was driven to base its finances upon sounder principles. It is said, indeed, that the people drove the Government to the adoption of the sounder system. It was one of the many instances in which the governed exhibited greater wisdom, or at least greater courage, than their Government.

In his annual report for 1863, Secretary Chase said that it was not too much to say that it was hardly enough to say that every dollar raised by taxation saved $2 in the enhancement of the public credit and in other economies. All authorities agree that if the policy of vigorous taxation had been adopted earlier in the war it would have minimized the evils of inflation during the war and the evils of contraction after the war.

Mr. President, we ought not to close our ears entirely to the voice of authority; we ought not to close our eyes to the lamp of experience. We will not do so permanently, because you can not temporize with principles which are sovereign. I have seen it stated upon reputable authority that if we should make a levy upon the taxpaying capacity of this country to-day equivalent to that made during the fiscal year of 1865–66 it would produce an annual revenue of $6,000,000,000. Pity it is that we have not inherited the financial fiber of our fathers.

Lord God of hosts be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

Mr. President, I wish to consider the application of the taxing power and the borrowing power to the one great resource of revenue which is open alike to the application of either of these powers. There are several resources from which you can obtain money by the use of public credit which are not available through the taxing power. They are important in a general discussion of this subject; they are not important in the particular discussion now at hand. I eliminate those from the equation. I confine my remarks to the one great resource which the Government has the choice to approach either through the power to tax or through the power to borrow. I refer to current earnings, incomes or profits. I shall confine my remarks in the main to what are known as war profits, profits growing out of the war, profits arising out of the conditions of war, profits over and above those which were realized during the "piping times of peace."

Now, Mr. President, the Government has its choice. It can avail itself of these war profits for its own use either by borrowing or by taxation. Which is the better plan? This question, it seems, would almost answer itself. The Government can take whatever part it needs of war profits by taxation without any obligation to repay, or it can obtain such part of war profits by the issuance of bonds which carry an obligation to repay.

Now, which is the wiser choice between the two plans? Of course, the taxing power is absolute. It depends only upon the will of the Government and not upon the will but upon the ability of the taxpayer. The borrowing power depends not alone upon the pleasure of the Government; it depends upon the pleasure of those who have means available for investment. Which is better, for the Government to take war profits by way of taxation or by way of loans? Considering the Government alone, there can be but one answer.

Which is better for organized society, to obtain the required revenue without an obligation to repay or to obtain the required revenue with the obligation to repay? From the standpoint of organized society, there can be but one answer. Which is better for the individual owner of the war profits, to have them taken by taxation without a promise of repayment or to have them taken by the borrowing power with the promise of the Government to make repayment? There can be but one answer to that question. It is better for the individual owner of the profits to hold the gilt-edge security for the return of his investment, principal plus interest. On the one hand, the interest of the Government, the interest of organized society, pleads for a system relying largely upon taxation without the obligation to make repayment. On the other hand, it is to the interest of the individual to hold the bonds of the Government, secured by all the property of all the people.

Now, which of these two considerations should determine our choice? Of course, each Senator must decide for himself. I doubt not that in the long run this country will insist upon liberal taxes being levied upon the profits of war. I warn the chairman of the Finance Committee now, and I warn the ranking Republican member of the Finance Committee, that the enforced moderation of this day means immoderation upon the morrow. That is the unfailing law of reaction. If we persevere in this course now, at no distant day the House will possibly send us a revenue measure that will cut almost to the heart of business itself. But I have no right to exercise the function of prophecy.

Mr. President, there are one or two points urged against the taxing system and in favor of the borrowing system to which I wish to address myself for a moment. I believe it was the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] who argued a few days ago that if we took too much war profits by taxation there would not be enough left available for bonds. To whatever extent we take what we need of war profits by taxation it will to that extent be unnecessary to avail ourselves of that resource by the use of public credit. There would be no need to concern ourselves about getting what we had already gotten.

But, Mr. President, the suggestion that taking too much of taxation does not leave enough available for public credit is reasoning in a circle. It begs the very point at issue, which is this: Which is the better method of obtaining the money, by taxation or by borrowing?

Mr. President, I believe it was the same Senator who made the point that if these profits were taken by taxation there would not be enough left in the hands of business concerns to serve as an incentive for future business operations; that there would not be enough left in their hands for the enlargement of existing industries or for the establishment of new and necessary enterprises. Of course, Mr. President, whatever part of these war profits we take out of the hands of the owners by taxation will not remain in their hands and be available for the expansion of their business, but it is almost equally true—

Mr. LEWIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. LEWIS. I will not disturb the Senator except to say that it was my argument to which he now alludes, which he has imputed to another Senator; and I further exempt the other Senator from whatever condemnation might follow it. The suggestion the Senator referred to came from me and not from the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GORE. I do not think the Senator from Illinois has a monopoly upon that mistake.

Mr. LEWIS. But I wished at this time merely to correct one part of my friend's statement.

Mr. GORE. I admire the chivalry of the Senator. To a certain extent it is a sort of vicarious atonement for others.

Mr. President, I say it is, of course, true that whatever part of the current war profits are taken by way of taxation will not remain in the hands of the owner and there be available for the expansion of his business. It is almost equally true, however, that whatever part of these war profits the Government obtains by the issuance of bonds, will not remain in the hands of the original owner and there be available for the expansion of old or the establishment of new enterprises. However the money is obtained its expenditure on a vast scale and in a limited time by the Government will serve as a stimulus to business.

I am not unmindful of the point just made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that the bonds issued to obtain this money would serve as a basis of credit. That argument if it has a virtue has also a vice, to which I shall presently call the attention of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, there is still a better answer to each of these arguments. We can not settle a question of this sort in the abstract; we must apply it to concrete facts. In the pending bill we have selected as the prewar period the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. Upon those years we base our decisions as to prewar profits or peace profits. The net profits of the concerns to be taxed in this bill averaged for those three years about $3,000,000,000 a year; the net profits of the concerns to be taxed last year, 1916, about $6,000,000,000. Three billion dollars of this represented peace profits, $3,000,000,000 represented the profits growing out of the war situation in Europe.

It is estimated that for the current year the profits of the concerns to be taxed will aggregate $9,000,000,000. Indeed, I have seen the estimate placed as high as $10,000,000,000. I accept the lower figure because it is more conservative.

Now, $3,000,000,000 of that represents ordinary peace profits. Six billion dollars represents the profits of war. There is a good deal of force in the argument that no one should be allowed to derive profits out of war. I would like to demote war. I might almost say, and say in no invidious sense, every dollar of war profits is dripping with blood and tears.

The majority of the committee have reported a graduated scale of taxation upon war profits ranging from 12 per cent on low war profits up to 60 per cent when the war profits are 300 per cent over and above peace profits. That is the snow line upon their Mount Everest. The chairman of the Finance Committee, in opening the debate, said that after the recommended taxes upon profits had been taken they had left these concerns a profit beyond the dreams of avarice. Mr. President, in this hour of the Nation's need we leave these concerns profits beyond the dreams of avarice.

Now, at this moment I am insisting upon no particular rate. I think the rate ought to be flat, and it ought to be as high as can be without jeopardizing business prosperity. Nobody can consent to cut down the fruit tree in order to get the fruit. Nobody can wish to interfere either with the progress or with the expansion of legitimate business. That question is eliminated from the discussion. Opinions may differ as to the amount, but as to the principle there can be no difference. The majority of the committee admits that under certain circumstances a rate of 60 per cent is not too high on war profits. I am not at this time discussing the intrinsic or final merits of the 60 per cent rate on war profits. It it were found practical, I should much rejoice to see not less than 50 per cent of war expenditures raised by taxation and not more than 50 per cent raised by the issuance of bonds. Final judgment as to the exact ratio can not be made up at this time. I exclude from this ratio, at least for the present, bonds which are to be issued in exchange for the bonds of the allies. They are in a different class and stand upon a different principle.

Mr. President, let us suppose that the rate of 60 per cent were made horizontal instead of graduated and consider the result. Sixty per cent on war profits of $6,000,000,000 would raise a revenue of $3,600,000,000, three times as much as the pending bill, with the latest committee amendment, proposes to raise, and five times as much as the bill as originally reported proposed to raise. During the pending debate the majority of the committee have recommended an increase of $500,000,000. This is matter for congratulation upon the part of those of us who signed the minority report, as well as upon the part of the country at large. This $3,600,000,000 would enable us to dispense with a large part of the long-time bonds proposed to be issued, exclusive of those which are to be exchanged with the allies. After taking this $3,600,000,000 we would still leave in the hands of the beneficiaries war profits aggregating $2,400,000,000 untouched and untaxed. Add to that the $3,000,000,000 of peace profits and you have an aggregate of $5,400,000,000 neither touched nor taxed by the hand of the Government. Verily $5,400,000,000 constitutes a golden profit beyond the dreams of avarice.

Would $5,400,000,000 serve as a stimulus to business? Would it be a sufficient incentive to keep business going? They did run in peace times for $3,000,000,000. Would they strike in war times with a golden temptation of $5,400,000,000 before their eyes? Oh, ye of little faith!

Sir, it can not be made too plain that the chief business of this country to-day is to win this war, to win it at the earliest possible moment, to win it without permitting any other business to interfere with the realization of that immediate and overpowering purpose. This means economy of treasure, of tears, and blood. It is an old proverb that there is danger in delay, but in these tragic times there is death in delay. Would not $5,400,000,000 constitute a fair reserve for the enlargement of existing plants? Would not $5,400,000,000 serve as a pretty generous reservoir for the construction of new and necessary establishments?

Mr. President, what laboring man in America will realize war profits 300 per cent over and above the profits of peace? What farmer in the United States, with the price of his products artificially controlled, will realize war profits 300 per cent over and above the profits of peace? What merchant in the United States will realize war profits towering 300 per cent over and above the profits of peace? I ask, sir, what manufacturer will realize profits which transcend by 300 per cent the ordinary profits of peace? Are these profits to be regarded as a sort of touch-me-not a sort of Saguntum, upon which we must not lay heavy hands? These profits, Mr. President, surpass the dreams of avarice.

Speaking of manufacturers, however, let me say that as a sort of guess few manufacturing concerns in this country realize a profit of 300 per cent over and above peace profits except those which are monopolies and those which are engaged in the production of war specialties, military supplies, and the like.

Let us consider one or two cases. Take the Bethlehem Steel Co. Their peace profits, as I remember, were $3,000,000 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Five million dollars, it was stated.

Mr. GORE. I looked at the paper this morning.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was claimed here that it went from $5,000,000 to $56,000,000.

Mr. GORE. Either three or five. I investigated the table this morning, and my recollection is that it was $3,000,000, but that is immaterial. The earnings of this concern for 1916 were $43,000,000. Do you imagine that if we should take 60 per cent over and above these profits they would decline to continue in business?

Mr. President, take the Du Pont Powder Co. Its peace profits were $5,000,000 a year. For 1916 its profits aggregated $82,000,000. For the current year it will undoubtedly mount far above that figure. There is a profit, sir, beyond the dream of avarice. Will they decline to operate if you subtract a reasonable war tax from their fabulous income?

Take the United States Steel Co. Its peace profits were $63,000,000. Based upon the first six months of the current year it is estimated that their earnings for 1917 will rise to the unprecedented figure of $490,000,000. Did avarice ever dream such a dream. Shall we scruple to share generously the profits of this concern in this hour of supreme necessity?

Mr. President, I saw in some newspaper the other day that this war had produced a crop of 30,000 new millionaires in America. To me the number seems incredible. But that is not the point. The paper commented that these particular men were not enthusiastic for an early peace, that they reconciled themselves with marvelous fortitude to the existence and the ravages of war. Are we bound for the honor of human nature to discredit such a conclusion? But has the majority of the Finance Committee assumed and is the Senate to act upon the assumption that the munition makers of this country are sitting to-day like vultures upon the tree of life? Nothing should be done that would give either real or apparent ground for any man in America to believe or to suspect that this war is a rich man's war and a poor man's fight. That, sir, would be most unfortunate.

Mr. President, there are two or three distinct advantages in favor of large reliance upon taxation as contrasted with too large a reliance upon public credit. The overuse of public credit leads to inflation. I shall not discuss inflation in detail. I will merely observe that during the Civil War the overuse of Government credit in the form of bond issues and paper-money issues brought about the inevitable evils of inflation. The problem of high prices and the increasing cost of living in the warring countries has largely arisen out of the overissue of Government bonds and of the overissue of paper money. I do not say, of course, exclusively, because high prices are an inseparable incident of war. You can no more rid war of these evils than you can control the mighty currents of the sea.

Wages and salaries have not advanced so rapidly as prices. The widening chasm between wages and salaries on the one hand and the cost of living upon the other is the sunken road to Ohain. It is filled with tragedy.

We have recently been enacting most extraordinary legislation designed, if not calculated, to arrest or reduce rising prices and to curb advances in the cost of living. Shall we now, sir, adopt a fiscal policy which inevitably, and as attested by the voice of all human experience, must bring upon us the very evils which we but yesterday were legislating to prevent? Is that the part of statesmanship? On the other hand, a large reliance upon taxation operates automatically to curb the tendency toward inflation, to check rising prices, to check the increase in the cost of living, and to arrest the lowering standards of living. I do not say that taxation, however heavy, can entirely accomplish those results, because I have shown that they are beyond the possibility of human accomplishment. The causes which tend to produce them are more omnipotent than any power which we can exert to counteract them.

Mr. President, I have considered the immediate effects of undertaxing and overborrowing upon the immediate present, and also upon the immediate future. I now wish to consider their relative effects upon the more distant future.

"Let us dip into the future, far as human eye can see."

It is estimated by Dr. Seligman, of Columbia University, that if this war continues for two years our aggregate bonded indebtedness will amount to $20,000,000,000. It will undoubtedly bear at least as high a rate of interest as 4 per cent. That would permit and perhaps induce a like rate on the bonds heretofore issued. While speaking of the rates of interest, let me remind you that when the other liberty loan was being floated, Mr. Otto Kahn took occasion to say, in addressing the Merchants' Association of New York: "The cause which we are endeavoring to serve here to-day bears no resemblance to sacrifice." He then significantly added, "It is patriotism plus 3½ per cent"—patriotism plus 3½ per cent.

He then added that the exemption clause and the conversion privilege constituted a most tempting combination. Mr. President, did you ever see a finer eye for the main chance? "Patriotism plus 3½ per cent!" And he demonstrated that if a man had an income from these tax-exempt bonds amounting to $1,000,000 the real return on the investment would be 8.2 per cent. With the higher tax rate imposed in the pending bill it would represent an investment bearing a much higher rate than 8.2 per cent. It would be patriotism plus the larger rate.

But let us see. An investment of $20,000,000,000 running for 25 years at 4 per cent means what? That at the end of the first 25 years the American people will have paid $20,000,000,000 in the form of interest, and that they would still owe the principal, amounting to $20,000,000,000. If this indebtedness runs for a hundred years—and much of it will run much longer than a hundred years—for we owe to-day nearly one-fourth of the bonded indebtedness growing out of the Civil War, and part of Great Britain's funded debt is more than 220 years old—if the indebtedness of $20,000,000,000 should run for a century, bearing 4 per cent, it would mean that at the end of the century the people had paid $80,000,000,000 in the form of interest, and still owed the principal, amounting to $20,000,000,000!

Can this leave any doubt as to which were the wiser way—relying more largely upon taxation and less largely upon credit, or relying more largely upon credit and less largely upon taxation? That is the point.

Mr. President, the statesmen of this generation have voted to declare war; they have voted to draft our children to fight this war. Shall we now be asked to draft our children and our children's children to pay for this war? Is our only glory to be the declaration of war? It requires but little moral or physical courage to declare a war for others to fight; it requires no great amount of financial courage to declare a war for others to pay for. Shall we pass this indebtedness on to posterity? Shall we assume that they will have no problems of their own; that they will have no vast emergencies of their own, constituting a drain upon their resources?

Who holds a commission to exempt the present from taxation and to shift that taxation to unborn posterity? The chairman of the Finance Committee a few days ago paid a most eloquent tribute unto posterity; from out the mystic future we could hear their glad huzzas. I do not doubt posterity will deserve the tribute; but I am concerned that we shall deserve an equal tribute at their lips. I am concerned that posterity may be able and may be willing to reciprocate the eulogium. We should leave no temptation to posterity to erect above our resting place a brazen monument bearing the epitaph, "Hic jacet slacker." (Here lies the slacker.)

Mr. President, what are we asked to do? This is a vast war. We are sending our best and our bravest to fight our battles and to win our victories. They will bring back victory upon the banner of this Republic unto those who sent them abroad with their blessing.

Shall they return to the open arms of a grateful people with no vast legacy of indebtedness to keep them in chains and servitude during the remainder of what should be a glorious existence, or shall we dodge our duty and leave these debts to be paid by these returning soldiers; by the crippled, by the halt, by the deaf, and the blind, to be paid by the mutilated images of a forbearing Deity?

God of our fathers smite us not,
We have forgot, we have forgot.

In the end I have no doubt that a wiser policy will prevail, and that we shall pay the uttermost farthing that can be raised by way of taxation without too serious a jeopardy to business and to business prosperity.

Mr. President, there is an added reason for levying heavy taxation upon war profits. It is an unanswerable reason. It is this: That you can only tax war profits while war profits are being earned. You can not tax them when peace returns. We must hit while the iron is hot. It is as true in public finance as in hydraulics that the mill never grinds with the water that is passed.

Mr. President, I listened with some interest to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] a few moments ago when he asked in his speech, "Why make these taxes overhigh now, when Congress meets again in December?" There is a fundamental fallacy underlying the policy recommended by the Finance Committee. This session adjourns within a few days. The regular session does not meet until December. This is the only and the last revenue bill that will be passed in the calendar year 1917. The pending bill as it passed the other House, imposed what was called a retroactive tax upon the distributed incomes of 1916.

I watched with interest the indignation with which the Finance Committee struck that retroactive tax out of the pending bill, and here in the majority report they characterize that retroactive tax as alike immoral and uneconomic. Sir, this is the only revenue bill that will pass during 1917. If any man shall be so bold as to propose in 1918 the levying of an additional or a retroactive tax upon war profits of 1917, we shall witness the same burning indignation. This majority report will then return to plague us. It will then be insisted that the imposition of a retroactive tax upon the enormous war profits of 1917 would be immoral and uneconomic, and these golden profits will smile at us from a citadel, from a sanctuary rendered proof against the approach of such a tax.

Who will be able to answer this argument set forth in the majority report to the satisfaction of the Finance Committee? Not only that, but when these war profits pass with the war—and Heaven speed the day—we must then resort to other taxation; we must find other sources and resources from which to derive our revenue. That means taxation upon consumption; taxation upon want instead of wealth; taxation upon necessities instead of luxuries; taxation upon the earnings of labor instead of upon the war profits of munition makers. Did not the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the ranking member of the Finance Committee on the minority side, who will be the chairman of the great Finance Committee if the Senate shall return to the Republican fold—did he not express surprise here on this floor the other day that the pending bill did not contain a provision that it should expire with the conclusion of the war; that it should lapse when peace returns; that these high taxes should not be exacted upon profits over and above those earned on a peace basis when hostilities have ceased?

But he expressed the hope that a different system of taxation would be substituted for this and in express terms pronounced in favor of a protective tariff. That, I say to Senators on this side of the Chamber, is the fate in reserve for this country if this policy prevails. Let the vast war profits pass into capital, let them pass into history, and you will not be able then to impose a retroactive tax, but must rely upon extorting revenue from consumption, taxing the clothes upon the back of the poor and the bread upon the lips of hunger.
